YOUNG WILD WEST'S RELAY RACE

—OR—

THE FIGHT AT FORT FEATHER

By AN OLD SCOUT

CHAPTER I.

ATTACKED BY REDSKINS.

Sun-set on the banks of the Green River, in Utah.

A party consisting of thirty men, women and children have just come to a halt and are arranging to camp for the night.

All day long they had been riding over a sandy desert, when at last the aspect of the country changed, and instead of banks of sand and groups of dull, gray rocks, the green verdure that grew along the river was before them.

Old Dave Burlew, the experienced guide, had contracted to lead a party from Denver to Richfield, Utah, where they proposed to settle down.

There were but eight men in the party, besides the guide. They had sold their property in Kansas, and with their wives and children had come to Denver by rail.

Then the services of the guide had come in play, and as our story opens we find them a little over half-way to their destination.

Wagons drawn by mule teams carried the belongings of the emigrants, the women and children riding in them.

The men had provided themselves with horses, and they rode along with the old guide.

So far the journey had been an uninterrupted one, but Dave Burlew had shown signs of being a little bit worried when they first struck the green grass and beheld the shining, crooked stream in the distance.

While the women were preparing the evening meal he took his trusty rifle and started down the river bank.

"I'm goin' ter try an' shoot some game afore dark," he explained to the men of the party as he went away.

But that was not what he intended to do.

Old Dave had seen Indian signs, and he was afraid that the Utes had broken out and started a war on the whites again.

In the past two years they had done it three or four times, and each time there had been a slaughter of men, women and children before the red fiends could be subdued.

At the time of which we write Uncle Sam did not have the Indians under such good control as he has now.

Though there were forts scattered all over the Wild West, and the redskins were on reservations, every now and then some of them would take a notion to go back to the barbarous life they had been accustomed to lead, and then dreadful things would happen.

Dave Burlew had heard from several old settlers along the line of march that the Utes on the reservation had been reported as being restless, and that at Fort Feather the few cavalrymen stationed there were getting uneasy.

They feared there would be an Indian uprising, and then there would be serious trouble, since the regulars were stationed so far apart in the Green River region.

The old guide had barely got out of sight of the camp around a little bunch of cottonwoods when he saw a thin column of smoke rising from a hill about two miles distant.

"I knowed it!" he exclaimed, under his breath. "Ther Utes have broke loose, an' there's goin' ter be trouble, as sure's my name are Dave Burlew. It's what I calls too bad, too. These men I've got with me don't know nothin' about fightin' Injuns, an' there's ther wimmen an' children. It'll go hard with them, I reckon, if ther red galoots tackle us. Well, there's only one thing ter do, an' that is ter tell 'em, so we kin git ready. That smoke means somethin'!"

Then he took a look all around as far as his range of vision extended.

He was not surprised to see another thin column of smoke rise up from a point some three or four miles to the right of the first one.

"That's ther answer," the old man muttered. "Ther redskins what sent up ther first smoke know we're here, an' they have let ther others know about it. We've got ter git ready for an attack. I wonder if there's many soldiers at Fort Feather now. Ther fort is only thirty miles from here, an' that makes it look as though there ain't, 'cause ther redskins wouldn't be slingin' out ther signs like this if they was afraid of bein' tackled by ther cavalry from ther fort. It are most likely that there ain't mo're'n a dozen men at ther fort this very minute, an' that ther Injuns knows it."

Having come to this conclusion, the guide walked slowly back to the camp.

Alfred Graves was the recognized leader of the expedition, and he came out to meet him.

"You seem to be troubled over something, Dave," he said. "What is it? There isn't danger brewing, is there?"

"There is, Al," was the reply. "I might as well tell yer that."

"What is the danger?" and the face of Graves turned slightly pale.

"Injuns."

"What! Why, I thought the redskins were at peace with the whites, and were living contentedly on the reservations allotted to them."

"Well, I reckon some of 'em has broke out on ther war-path. I've heard some talk of it ther last week or two, but I've seen enough in ther last half hour ter make me believe that it's true. There's Injuns close by, an' they know we're here, too."

"Do you think they would really be bad enough to attack us?"

"If they've started on ther war-path they'll jest like ther chance of doin' it, Al."

Graves looked worried.

"Well, I suppose we will have to do the best we can," he said.

"That's right. It might be that they won't interfere with us. But we'd better git ready, ter make sure of it."

"That's right. We will tell the rest and let them be prepared for the worst."

Graves told them himself, and, as might be supposed, there was much fear shown, especially by the women and children.

The pretty dark-eyed daughter of Graves, whose name was Agnes, put on a hopeful look, though, and she quickly said:

"I am very glad that I have learned how to shoot with a rifle on the way, father. I can be of some use if the Indians attack us. I can hit a bull's-eye at a hundred yards, so I guess I would be able to shoot a redskin if I saw him riding down upon us for the purpose of slaying us."

The male members of the party nodded their approval. It made them feel all the more determined to protect themselves and their families.

Not one of the travelers had dreamed of such a thing as being attacked by hostile Indians.

They had been on the lookout for roving bands of bad white men, for they were always to be feared in that wild part of the country.

But they were not to be compared with hostile Indians, so they thought.

Really, though, in many cases, they were much worse, as the flotsam and jetsam of the worst of mankind were to be found there—men who had prices upon their heads and who dared not show themselves in the cities and towns on account of the crimes they had committed.

Preparations were made to secure themselves against the redskins should any come, and the men went about it with a dogged determination, the women helping, as a matter of course.

Agnes Graves was the most cheerful of any in the party. "Keep cool," she kept saying to the women, and after a while she had them in pretty good spirits.

But none of them ate as heartily at supper as they would have done if they had not become acquainted with the fact that there were hostile Indians about.

The sun had gone down and darkness was beginning to gather.

The thin columns of smoke had died out and all was silence, save for the occasional bark of a coyote.

The covered wagons had been drawn in a semi-circle to the face of the cliff that reared itself a few yards from the bank of the river.

The men busied themselves cleaning and loading the firearms they possessed.

All had rifles, for they had considered it a necessity to possess themselves of such weapons before they set out from Denver to continue the journey through the wilderness.

Gradually the darkness gathered and the stars came out one by one.

Old Dave Burlew was outside the circle assisting half a dozen of the men roll up big stones under the wagons, so the women and children would have places to crouch behind when the fight began—if there was a fight.

All hoped there would not be, of course, but, by the way the guide acted, it seemed almost a certainty.

An hour passed.

The party of travelers were restless from the strain of the thing.

"I reckon I'll take a little scout around an' see if there is any of ther redskins around," he said in a low tone. "I want everybody ter keep quiet an' lay low. We ain't got no fire ter show 'em jest where we are, an' it may be that they won't strike us."

But what he said last was merely to cheer them up.

The Indian signs he had seen were enough to convince him that there was bound to be a visit from the redskins, providing there was any big number of them about.

If there were no more than a dozen of them they would be safe from an attack, for the redskins had had so much experience in fighting the palefaces that they knew it required at least two to one to perfect a slaughter.

Dave Burlew kept close to the ground as he stole away from the camp.

He was experienced in that line, and he was acting just as though he was certain that there were Indians about.

He went up the river for a hundred yards and then turned and went down

Then he cast his eyes over the rippling surface of Green River and strove to look across.

The old man could just see the dark outlines of the bank on the opposite side, and as he looked he suddenly noticed something push out and start across the stream.

"A canoe, by jingo!" he muttered.

He waited for over a minute and then he could see that the canoe had half a dozen forms in it.

"That's all from that side of ther river, I reckon," he muttered. "Well, ther second column of smoke was on this side, so that's where ther most of 'em will come from. I'll jest git back ter ther camp, for ther chances is that ther rest of 'em is close by now."

He had scarcely made a move to start when the hoot of an owl sounded near him.

Burlew dropped close to the ground and remained perfectly still.

While it was almost the exact cry of an owl, he knew that it was not one of the birds that had uttered it.

That it came from a nearby redskin, and was meant as a signal, he was certain.

Just then the hoot was answered from the river.

The old guide now began creeping cautiously for the camp. He knew he had no time to spare.

Fortunately the hiding Indians were not near enough to observe him as he moved along through the darkness, and he soon got inside the barricade that had been formed.

"Git your guns ready an' lay low!" he whispered. "Ther redskins is coming!"

The words were hardly out of his mouth when another hoot rang out, and then the answer came.

"Do yer hear that?" the old man whispered, hoarsely.

"Yes," answered Alfred Graves; "it is an owl, isn't it?"

"Not much! It's redskins. Everybody git ready!"

The women and children were hastily placed behind the rocks, and then the male members of the party knelt with their rifles through the openings between the wagons.

Five minutes passed in silence.

To the waiting men it was almost torture.

Not one of them, with the exception of the guide, had ever experienced Indian fighting, and they knew not what to do.

The keen eyes of the old man soon discovered dark forms creeping along the river bank, and then he knew that those in the canoe had landed, and were joining the gang on that side.

It would only be the question of a few minutes before the attack would be made now, and he knew it.

Five minutes more passed.

Then, with a suddenness that was startling in the fullest sense, a yell sounded.

At least a score of throats gave utterance to it and it caused the waiting travelers to thrill with fear.

"Fire when I say ther word," said Burlew; "but don't shoot too high, 'cause we can't afford ter waste any shots. If we kin mow down half a dozen of 'em right at ther start we'll have 'em, I think!"

The next instant a score of dark forms were seen leaping toward the wagons.

"Fire!" shouted Dave Burlew.

Then ten rifles belched forth streaks of fire, for Agnes Graves was ready when the word was given, and she did not hesitate to shoot.

The Indians paused and dropped low to the ground, for the reception they got was a little more than they expected, evidently.

It was impossible for the besieged party to tell how many had been hit, but old Dave Burlew knew the volley had been disastrous to them.

Three of the men owned repeating rifles, and they kept on firing.

But the old man quickly stopped them.

"What are yer shootin' at?" he cried. "Don't waste your bullets. Don't pull a trigger unless yer kin see what you're shootin' at."

The first rush of the red demons had been checked, but that was only temporary.

They had become strangely silent right after the volley had been fired, and for a couple of minutes they remained that way.

Then the fierce warwhoop sounded again and they came with a rush, firing as they did so.

This was the first shooting they had done, and they sent the bullets through the wagon covers with a vengeance.

But the precautions the travelers had taken saved them from being hit.

"Give it ter 'em!" shouted Burlew. "Aim straight, men!"

Crack—crack—cra-ang!

Another volley was fired, and the guide saw at least four of the attacking party go down.

But the others came right on, and a second later they were climbing over the wagons.

"Give it ter 'em!" cried the guide, firing his revolver right in the face of a brave who was in the act of leaping down into the inclosure.

Then it was that a desperate battle was begun.

But it was bound to result in defeat for the brave band of whites, unless something happened.

Something did happen, for just then a shout sounded from the trail back from the river bank, and during the brief intervals between the shots the sounds of galloping hoofs could be heard.

Crack—crack—crack!

Three shots rang out from the rear of the redskin band and then they turned and fled in wild disorder.

"Whoopce!" shouted a voice. "Young Wild West an' his pard is in time, I reckon. Put it inter ther sneakin' red galoots!"

CHAPTER II.

YOUNG WILD WEST AND HIS PARTNERS.

The cracking of revolvers now made such a noise that the party of travelers could not hear anything further.

But they knew that help had come, and that was sufficient to make them join in giving a cheer.

The red-skins were no longer close enough to be seen, so the horsemen who had come to the rescue dismounted.

"Strike a light, friends," said a clear voice that showed how cool the speaker was. "There is no danger of that gang bothering you right away again, I guess."

"Right yer are, pard!" exclaimed Dave Burlew, and he hurriedly lighted a lantern.

Then the thankful band of travelers saw that there were only three in the party that had come to the rescue.

Two of them were nothing more than boys, though they were of medium height and build, and the other was a tall man, still young in years.

"Thunder!" cried old Dave Burlew, as he held the lantern so the light could shine on the newcomers; "it's Young Wild West an' his pard, sure enough! I knowed it was ther voice of Cheyenne Charlie what yelled out that Young Wild West an' his pards was comin'. Howsumever, there wasn't nothin' sure about it, so I didn't say anything. Now I kin see with my own eyes."

"Hello, Dave!" answered one of the boys, as he stepped forward and shook the old man's hand.

Though but a boy in years, he looked every inch a man, as far as strength and agility went.

Handsome as an Apollo, with a wealth of long chestnut hair hanging over his shoulders, he made a picture of the true young Westerner.

He was attired in a neat-fitting hunting suit of buckskin that was elaborately trimmed with scarlet silk fringe, which set off his graceful, athletic form to the best advantage.

In his hand was the revolver that had dealt out several shots to the hostile Utes, and swung over his shoulder was a Winchester rifle, which was a dangerous weapon in his hands, for Young Wild West was the recognized Champion Deadshot of the Wild West.

He was also known as the Prince of the Saddle, owing to the fact that his equal had never been found at taming and riding a wild horse of the prairies.

The other boy, Jim Dart, who, like Young Wild West, had been born and reared on the border, was a good-looking young fellow, strong and active, and he, too, wore a fancy buckskin hunting suit.

The third in the little party was Cheyenne Charlie, the well-known scout and Indian fighter. He was a trifle over six feet in height and was supple and straight as an arrow.

His face was bronzed from the sun and winds of the mountains and plains, and his long black hair and drooping mustache added a look to him that would have given the casual observer the impression that he was a dangerous man to fool with.

And so he was, too. Being rather hot-headed and afraid of nothing, he was apt to get into trouble at almost any time.

That was why he relied upon Young Wild West as a leader.

The dashing young deadshot was cool and cautious under all conditions. He never lost his head, and his judgment was second to none.

The dashing young deadshot, in company with his two partners, Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart, had experienced more startling adventures and had been through more hair-breadth escapes than usually falls to the lot of men.

The three often gave the government valuable service in the capacity of scouts, and they were now on their way to Fort Feather, whither they had been summoned to help put down an uprising of the Utes.

They had left the wife of Cheyenne Charlie and the two sweethearts of the boys at Silver Plume in the charge of friends, and had started out to assist all they could in the work of subduing the treacherous Indians.

As we have already stated, the troopers in that part of Utah were pretty well scattered around, and the fact that the rebellious Utes had established a headquarters less than thirty miles from Fort Feather, on the Green River, made it appear as though they cared nothing for the fort, and in all probability meant to attack it and take charge.

Word had been received by Young Wild West two days before the opening of our story, and they had been riding hard ever since they set out for the fort.

It was lucky for old Dave Burlew and the party he was guiding across the desert and plains that they happened along just as they did.

Fort Feather was forty miles away from the spot where the travelers were camped, and as Young Wild West and his partners were camped, and as Young Wild West and his partners had been riding hard all day they decided to stop there till morning.

They were not long in being introduced to the party of travelers and then they made themselves at home, so to speak.

A fire was started and the women made coffee for them, and while this was going on the three gave their tired horses a good rubbing down.

Young Wild West had the fastest and most intelligent steed known in the whole West.

It was a sorrel stallion and bore the name of Spitfire, which the dashing young Prince of the Saddle had given him while breaking him from a wild horse of the prairies.

The dashing boy valued the stallion highly, and though he had been offered big sums of money for him, he had never once thought of parting with Spitfire.

Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart both owned the best money could buy in the line of horseflesh, and the three were able to keep out of the way of the fastest Indian ponies on the plains and mountains.

And when they started to ride down a bad Indian or a villainous white renegade they generally succeeded.

Old Dave Burlew had taken a scout around as soon as he was done greeting the three dashing scouts, and he came back with the report that there were seven dead redskins lying close to the camp and that the living ones had crossed the river.

The survivors of those who came across in the canoe had gone back in the same way they came and the others had made their horses swim across.

"I guess they won't bother us again to-night," said Young Wild West, when he had heard the report of the guide. "There are not enough of them for that. If they do come I'll guarantee that there won't be many left of them when we get through with them."

"I reckon there won't be, not if you an' your pards draws beads on 'em," retorted Burlew, nodding at the dashing boy in admiration. "I knows all about you fellows, Young Wild West. When you git after Injuns, or any other kind of game it's good-by to 'em, an' no mistake!"

"Well, I don't know as we are any better than anyone else in that line," the young deadshot said, with a laugh. "We always do our best when we start to do a thing, though."

The travelers felt secure, now that the three had arrived. During the brief fight with the redskins only one man had been wounded, and that was so slight that he would be all right again in a few days.

A good watch was kept during the night, but the redskins failed to show up again, and when morning dawned Young

Wild West advised the guide to set out for Fort Feather without any loss of time.

"If you attempt to keep on the trail you will surely get caught by the Utes," he added. "It will only make a delay of a few days, at the most, for as soon as we get the troopers together the uprising will be put down in short order. I think you can do no better than to go to the fort."

"That is jest what I think," Burlew replied. "I was going to do that if the Injuns had not bothered us last night, even. I don't want to run no risk with ther wimmen an' children I've got in charge."

Then he told the members of the party what the young deadshot said, and they were unanimous in deciding to take the advice of Young Wild West.

While the women were getting the breakfast ready Young Wild West mounted his sorrel stallion, Spitfire, and went out to reconnoiter.

He rode down the river bank for a mile, keeping a watch on the hills at the other side, and then he suddenly saw smoke arising from behind a clump of rocks half a mile away.

The boy gave a nod of satisfaction.

"So there is where you are, eh?" he muttered. "Getting your breakfast, I suppose. Well, I suppose you are anxious for us to get away, so you can come over this side and bury your dead."

As the young deadshot turned his horse to ride back a puff of smoke suddenly came from a tree top near the place where he had located the Indian camp.

He gave the sorrel a quick tap and the animal leaped forward just as a report sounded.

Wild heard the hum of a bullet as it went past the back of his head.

"Whoa, Spitfire!" he cried.

Then, as the sorrel came to an abrupt halt, his rifle flew to his shoulder.

There was an Indian hidden in the top of that tree, and, though the dashing young deadshot could not see his outlines, he could see a small part of the foliage moving.

It could not be caused by a breeze, for there was hardly a breath of air stirring just then.

Taking a quick aim at the moving foliage in the tree that was fully half a mile away, he pressed the trigger.

Cra-ang!

The sharp report rang out clear and distinct on the still morning air.

Then, one after another, the lower limbs of the tree bent and swayed, and finally Wild caught sight of a descending body.

"I guess that fellow won't ever fire another shot from the top of a tree," he thought. "He was a pretty good shot, for if Spitfire had not jumped forward just as he did, I would have got that bullet."

The young deadshot rode back to the camp at a canter, just as though nothing out of the ordinary had happened.

"I reckon yer must have picked off one of ther redskins, Wild?" remarked Cheyenne Charlie, questioningly, as he rode in and brought his horse to a halt.

"Yes," was the reply; "one of them fired at me from the top of a tree on the other side of the river, and I then fired and brought him down. That makes one less to bother the whites, I guess."

The travelers looked at the dashing boy admiringly.

He was so cool, and had such an easy-going way about him, that he was bound to attract more than ordinary attention.

He told them just where the camp of the Utes was located, and then he set down to the breakfast that was now ready.

Though our three friends were in a hurry to get to Fort Feather, they deemed it advisable to stay with the wagon train and escort it there.

There was no telling how soon the redskins might make another attack on it, and it might be that they would have reinforcements soon.

That would make it bad for Dave Burlew and his party.

The mules were hitched to the wagons as soon as possible, and then those who rode horses mounted, and the outfit started off.

They were compelled to go three miles up the river before they found a place where it could be forded, and even then it took half an hour to get the wagons across.

Then they headed straight for the fort.

They saw no more of the Indians until about two hours before sunset.

Then they saw a small party following them about two miles in the rear.

The women became much alarmed as soon as they were aware of it, but Young Wild West assured them that there was no danger from that small crowd.

"There are only seven or eight of them," he said. "They won't attack us unless they meet more redskins to help them out. We will get to the fort in less than two hours now. I don't like the way those fellows are acting, though. They are coming up pretty close to the fort for hostile Indians, I think. The chances are that there are plenty more of them about."

"Oh, if we can only get to the fort!" said one of the women.

"We will get there all right," answered Agnes Graves, the pretty daughter of the head of the emigrating band.

"Yes," nodded Wild. "And I guess it won't hurt to make the mules jog along a bit, as they can have a good rest when we get there. The quicker we reach the fort the better, I think."

They kept on as fast as the mules could be made to travel, and as the minutes flitted by the pursuing redskins gradually fell back.

At length the fort came in sight.

It was really nothing more than a block house built on a little hill, with a stockade running around it.

On the north side of the stockade were a store and half a dozen cabins occupied by settlers.

It was not much of a place, but the travelers thought that once they got there they would be safe from the hostile Utes.

But they little dreamed of what was brewing.

The building that was called the fort had been built years before, and it had withstood more than one attack from the Indians.

But in a few short hours it was destined to have the hottest time of its existence.

CHAPTER III.

WILD FALLS INTO THE HANDS OF THE UTES.

As Young Wild West rode up to Fort Feather at the head of the party he was recognized by the officer in charge.

A cheer went up from a dozen throats, and then the settlers and their families came out of the cabins to see what it meant.

It was just about the time that the people of the quiet little post were eating the evening meal, and that was why our friends got there before they were observed by any but those on guard at the block house.

Lieutenant Ainsworth was in command just then, since even the general was away on a vacation.

He had been left at the fort with only fourteen cavalrymen.

The captain had taken the rest of the troop to scour the country to find out what the Utes were up to.

Young Wild West looked grave when he heard this.

"How long have the cavalrymen been gone?" he asked.

"They left early yesterday morning," was the reply.

"When were they to come back?"

"There was no specified time, I believe. You see, in the absence of the post commander and the colonel, Captain Darius has full charge, and he left me in charge while he went out with the men to pick up what information he can. If he thinks there is any danger of the Utes getting together in a large force a messenger will be sent to Fort Griffin, which is just ninety miles from here. The colonel is there, and he has four hundred men with him. There is where he figured that the seat of war would be, in case the Utes did rise and try to do something."

"Well, I think he made a mistake in thinking that way," Young Wild West answered. "I have seen just enough to convince me that Fort Feather is the place that will bear the brunt of it. You must know that the Utes are foxy redskins. It is more than probable that they know just how many men you have here. I did not tell you that a small party of them attacked the camp of the people I brought here last night, but I'll let you know all about it now."

Then the dashing young deadshot related all that had occurred, and Lieutenant Ainsworth showed much concern.

The lieutenant was well acquainted with Young Wild West and his partners and he had the utmost faith in them.

"And I have only fourteen men here," he said, shrugging his shoulders. "A couple of hundred armed Utes could take the block house, I suppose."

"Well, they would burn the cabins of the settlers and create a general havoc if they did not quite succeed in capturing the fort."

Then the two had a long, earnest talk.

The result was that at the first sign of a concentration of the Indians in the vicinity of the fort Young Wild West was to start on a wild ride to Fort Griffin for help.

There was a settlement called Creekville, thirty miles from the fort, and right on the way, and thirty miles farther on was another that was named Blackbird.

That left but thirty more to Fort Griffin.

Horses could be had at either of the settlements, of course, so if it came to a case of real hurry Young Wild West meant to make a relay race of it to Fort Griffin.

But he was in hopes that the redskins would not gather in large numbers, and in that case there would be no attack.

Darkness soon shut off all view of the surrounding country.

In about an hour Young Wild West and his partners went out and started to make a circuit of the fort about two miles out.

They had not gone more than three or four miles around when they saw a blazing fire off to the left at the top of a hill.

"That's an Injun signal, as sure as guns!" declared Cheyenne Charlie.

"That's right," nodded our hero.

Then their eyes suddenly caught sight of another fire about five miles distant.

It was only there for the space of a minute, for the Indians who made it must have extinguished it right away.

"That's an answer to their first one," remarked the scout. "I reckon their red galoots mean their fort all right, Wild."

"That's right, Charlie. But just wait. I guess we had better go and see how many they number before we go back."

"Sure!" spoke up Jim.

They now started to ride in the direction of the first fire, which was still burning, though it was gradually dying out.

"That means that all the Indians within sight of that fire will congregate there before morning," said Wild. "I guess we will have to stay out a while, in order to get a good report to take to the fort, boys."

"That's right, Wild," answered Charlie.

The distance to the signal fire was probably four miles, as near as they could judge, and they rode forward at a gallop.

Of course they did not mean to keep up such a swift pace when they got close to it, for that would have made known their presence to the Utes.

The fire kept gradually going down, but they were within a mile of it before it went out altogether.

There was a clump of thickly wooded hills right ahead now, and it was in these that the signal fire had been lighted.

They allowed their horses to walk, and as there was plenty of short, thick grass there, the sounds of the hoofs could scarcely be heard.

In a very few minutes they were in the timber and ascending an uneven slope.

They were getting dangerously close to the Indians now, and they knew it.

"The scoundrels certainly know that there are very few soldiers at the fort, or they would never make their headquarters so near it," Young Wild West observed. "I guess we had better dismount now, and I will go ahead on foot. You fellows can stay here with the horses."

"All right, Wild," answered Dart, who was ever ready to abide by what the young deadshot said.

"You want to be mighty careful, Wild," the scout said, as our hero dismounted. "It are more'n likely that their red galoots has got scouts out. If a couple of 'em should catch yer nappin' jest fire a shot, whether you've got time ter draw bead on 'em or not."

"All right, Charlie; that is just what I'll do. One shot will mean that I am caught. If you hear any more than that you will know that I am putting up a fight."

With that, the dashing young deadshot started off through the darkness of the woods.

Wild had not got more than fifty yards from his two partners when he heard the low murmur of voices.

He gave a nod of satisfaction, and then, after a slight pause, continued on his way.

He was using all the caution he possessed now, for he knew he was right near the camp of the Utes.

He made his way through the undergrowth without making a sound and gradually neared the parties who were conversing in low guttural tones.

Not until he was within twenty feet of the spot where the sounds came from did he pause.

Then he became aware of the fact that two Indians were conversing in their own language.

They were talking very low, too, and he could not understand what they were saying.

Young Wild West spoke and understood the language of the Sioux tribe very well, but he could not make out what the two were talking about.

But it was easy for him to guess that they were a couple of the braves who had been sent out to ascertain if there were any palefaces around.

The two braves had evidently met just as Wild came within hearing, for they now separated and moved off in different directions.

Wild waited until they had gone and then he crept forward again.

A hundred yards he covered, and then, as he came to the top of a little rise, he saw the light of a campfire not far away.

"I guess I am getting close to them now," he thought. "I am inside their lines, anyhow, and it won't be much trouble to find just how many there are of them here."

As he got a few steps nearer he saw that there were more than one fire burning.

There were as many as half a dozen.

It was a gully that the redskins were located in, just low enough to prevent the light made by their fires from being seen very far distant.

This showed that the signal fire had been burning on an elevation nearby.

The trees happened to be very close together on either side of the gully, and this enabled the boy to get as close as was necessary to suit his purpose.

Two minutes later and he was at a point where he could look almost straight up the gully, which was about a hundred feet wide right there.

It narrowed down at both ends, at a distance of probably two hundred yards apart.

"What a fine place to trap them, if I only had about fifty determined fighters at my back," thought Wild, for he could see that there were not more than a hundred Ute warriors there.

But that was not all that would be there, for the signal fire had been answered, and it was quite likely a hundred more—if not a larger number—were on their way there and pretty close to the camp.

Wild placed his hand on a small tree that leaned over and peered over to get a good view of the redskins below him.

The foliage of the tree hung close to the ground and shielded him from sight, even if the Indians had been looking that way.

When the dashing young deadshot saw that nearly all the Utes were armed with rifles he felt a bit uneasy.

"They mean to attack the fort, as sure as I am looking at them with my two eyes!" he muttered under his breath. "Well, I guess I will go back, for I have seen enough to make it quite plain that the situation is a desperate one."

In getting back to an upright position he gave a little extra pressure on the tree.

There was an ominous cracking sound, and then before he could get straightened up, the tree gave way, and he was sent whirling heels-over-head into the gully.

It had happened in such an unexpected manner that Wild had been unable to catch himself, and before he could get upon his feet half a dozen of the surprised Utes were at the spot where he landed.

The boy managed to draw one of his six-shooters, however, and he pressed the trigger, regardless of where the bullet went.

Crack!

The report rang out, and then there was a fierce yell from the redskins and Young Wild West was seized and disarmed.

Many against one is bound to result in a quick victory for the many when it is at such close quarters.

The boy did his best to get away from them, but he had been unable to get upon his feet.

He was quickly bound, and then two of the braves roughly dragged him to the light of a fire.

The Utes were jubilant.

They easily understood that he was a spy from the fort, and the fact that they had captured him made them feel like indulging in a war dance.

But the chief quickly pushed his way to the front and warned them to keep quiet.

Wild was not known by any in that particular crowd, and he was glad of it, for the majority of the chiefs throughout the West had reason to hate him for the excellent work he had done against them at different times.

"Paleface boy heap much brave!" ventured the chief, sneeringly.

"That's all right," answered Wild, coolly, for he had recovered from the astonishment his luckless fall had given him almost immediately, and he was now in his regular cool and easy frame of mind.

"What paleface boy do here?" the Ute leader went on. "I happened along this way and saw your campfires," was the reply. "I thought I would take a look at you, that's all." "Paleface boy heap much lie! He come from Fort Feather."

"Is Fort Feather near here?" asked Wild, innocently.

"Paleface hoy know where fort is."

"Are you on the war-path, chief?"

"Ugh!"

There was naught but scorn in the utterance.

Young Wild West realized that he was in a desperate predicament.

He could not make the chief believe he had happened along by accident, and he could get nothing from him as to what he was up to.

At an order from the chief he was bound to a tree near the center of the camp.

This had hardly been done when there was a shout close at hand, and the next minute full two hundred warriors with their war paint on came riding up the gully.

There were now at least three hundred of the Utes, and if they attacked Fort Feather it could never last long against them.

CHAPTER IV.

WILD GETS READY TO RIDE HIS RELAY RACE.

Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart were surprised when they heard the shot fired.

While they had had it understood that Wild was to fire a shot in case he got into trouble with the Indians, they hardly expected to hear it.

They thought he would succeed in his undertaking without being discovered.

"Great gimlets!" exclaimed the scout; "I reckon Wild's got inter trouble!"

Just then they heard the exultant cries of the redskins, and then they were sure that such a thing had happened.

"I don't know how they could have caught him," observed Jim Dart. "Something must have happened that was dead against him. Wild is always very careful."

The two waited for fully five minutes, and hearing nothing to indicate that Wild was coming back, they decided to try and find a way to get him from the redskins.

There was no doubt in their minds now but that he had been captured.

It was just then that they heard horses approaching.

There were many of them, as they could tell.

"More Injuns comin', I reckon," said the scout. "It'll be a good time now ter try an' git Wild away from 'em. If this is a new gang them what caught him will be putty much interested in 'em, an' that might give us a chance ter sneak in close an' cut 'em loose, fur yer kin bet they've got him tied, if they ain't killed him."

"Oh, they haven't killed him," answered Jim. "They wouldn't do that right away. They will want to find out what they can from him."

"Which will be nothin'," and the scout chuckled softly. "Wild ain't ther one ter give information ter his enemies that'll do 'em any good, yer know."

"Of course not. But if he can deceive them he will do it."

"Well, let's git over there an' find out jest what is ther matter."

"We will leave the horses right here."

"Yes."

They two now hurried in the direction Wild had taken.

They did not have to use so very much caution, since the noise made by the Utes in the camp drowned everything else.

But they did not know at what moment they might run into the arms of a Ute guard, so that made them keep a pretty sharp watch through the darkness.

The trees were so close together that they had to proceed by taking hold of them and moving along in that way.

By the time they got to the edge of the gully a general pow-wow was taking place in the camp.

It was quite evident that the redskins did not dream of such a thing as their captive having friends near, for they seemed to be making no effort to scour the vicinity in search of anybody.

"Great gimlets!" exclaimed the scout in a low whisper, "there's enough of ther measly coyotes there ter clean out ther fort, Jim."

"And that is just what they are getting ready to do, I'll bet," was Dart's reply.

"There ain't any doubt about that. Hello! There's Wild tied ter a tree!"

"That's right! They haven't done any more than make him a prisoner, Charlie. Now, let's figure a way to get him out of the scrape he is in. The redskins are not paying the least attention to him. They are holding a pow-wow to decide what they are going to do, I suppose. I guess you'll be the one to sneak into the camp and cut Wild loose, Charlie."

"I reckon I kin do it if anyone kin," was the reply.

The scout took a good look around. There were Indians on all sides of the captive boy but one.

The pow-wow was being held to the left of where he stood bound to the tree, and those who were not in the councils of the chiefs were gathered close to those who were, listening to what was being said.

The spot that was not guarded was on the side directly opposite and it was for this point that Charlie decided to make.

"You come part of ther way, Jim," he whispered. "I'm goin' ter cut him loose, an' then we'll run fur it. It'll be your business ter drop any of them what starts in ter stop us."

"All right. You can bet I'll do that."

Charlie now got ready for business.

He handed his rifle to Jim, for he did not want to be impeded by it, and then he tightened his belt a trifle.

The next minute he was moving around for the point he had picked out to make the approach to the rescue of Young

Wild West. The chief of those who had been in the camp when Young

Wild West fell into their hands was laying it down strongly to the chief of those who had got there.

Charlie realized that he would never have a better chance than at that moment.

He hurried forward, keeping his eyes on the redskins nearest to Wild as he did so.

The trees and bushes afforded him a good opportunity, and he made the best of it. He drew his bowie knife when he was within a dozen feet of the prisoner, and then, keeping close to the ground, he moved slowly toward him.

There was no such thing as hurrying now, for one glimpse of him by a redskin would spoil the whole thing.

Jim was waiting less than thirty feet away.

He was right at the edge of a camp behind two trees that grew close together, and he could shoot straight and sure, without the least difficulty from that point.

Charlie found that he could reach the tree that Wild was bound to without having to show himself to the redskins.

"I reckon Wild will soon be out of his difficulty," he muttered under his breath. "The red galoots is too busy talkin' over ther rascally plans ter notice what's goin' on here. But I ain't got no more time than I want, fur all that."

Without any further delay, he crept forward straight to the tree.

One more look to make sure that everything was all right, and he reached up with the knife and cut the thongs that held the dashing young deadshot to the tree.

Young Wild West felt his bonds give, but he made no sign. He had been expecting his partners to come to his rescue, for he knew they would not desert him.

"I'm here, Wild," the scout ventured to whisper.

"I know, Charlie," came the reply, while the boy kept his eyes on the group of Indians, just as he had been doing before he was aware that his partners were at hand.

Zip!

Another slash with the keen-edged knife and the bonds that held his wrists behind him were severed.

But Young Wild West never moved.

He was waiting until he had the freedom of his feet.

Charlie lost no time in cutting the thongs that had been placed about Wild's ankles.

Then the dashing young deadshot was free.

Lying at the foot of a tree a few feet from him were his revolvers and knife, and leaning against it was the rifle that had been swung over his shoulder when he was captured.

Charlie saw them, and he promptly crawled around to the back of the tree.

The next minute he had the weapons in his possession.

"Now, then, I reckon we'll git away from here, Wild," he whispered.

"All right," was the calm rejoinder; "lead the way."

Then Wild stepped around the tree.

Dropping to the ground, he crept through the bushes after the scout.

The two got to where Jim was waiting for them before the redskins became aware that their prisoner was not tied to the tree.

The brave that discovered it let out a warning cry and then the council broke up and there was a rush for the tree.

The severed bonds told the tale only too well.

"Run for it, boys!" said Young Wild West, and then up the side of the gully they went.

The savages caught a glimpse of their forms and saw the swaying bushes.

Then, yelling like so many wild demons, they started in pursuit.

But our hero and his partners knew just where the horses were, and without uttering a sound, they made for them.

They knew they could get through the thick woods as fast as the redskins could, and that meant that they would reach their horses in time to mount them and get away.

The pursuing Utes fired a volley, but the bullets all went wide of the mark.

The noise our friends made in getting through the undergrowth was drowned by that of the pursuers.

Charlie was going to turn and let a few shots go at them, but Wild stopped him.

"Don't!" he said. "They will only know the exact direction to come if you fire. Come on!"

It was very dark, but Wild knew just about where the horses were.

He gave a low whistle and instantly a whinny was heard. It came from his faithful steed, Spitfire.

The stallion knew the boy's whistle as much as he knew anything.

Wild made straight for the spot the whinny came from, followed by Charlie and Jim.

They reached the horses, and, mounting them, rode down the hill for the open prairie.

Then it was that a shout of defiance left the lips of the scout.

He could no longer restrain himself.

"Whoopie! Whoopie! Come on, you red galoots!" he cried. "I reckon we'll give yer all yer want!"

But the redskins were no longer pursuing them on foot.

The moment they heard the clatter of hoofs they started back to the camp for horses.

But Young Wild West and his partners had a good half-mile start of them, and there was no possibility of their being caught now.

They rode straight back to the fort and reported.

When Lieutenant Ainsworth heard that there were three hundred of the Utes camped so near he was much disturbed.

"I am of the opinion that they will attack us before daylight," he said.

"That will be just about the time they will do it," our hero answered.

"Then you must ride for help."

"I will do that gladly, and if anyone can get help I will."

"Ninety miles is a long distance, though."

"I know it is, but I will change horses at Creeksville, and when I get to Blackbird I will change again, as I said. All I want to make sure of is that my horse is well taken care of, and ready for me when I come back. You ought to hold the redskins off for twelve hours, at least. You have plenty of ammunition, and I'll guarantee you that every time Charlie and Jim pull a trigger a redskin will go down. They never waste any shots."

"Yes, we can hold them off for twelve hours, I think," said the lieutenant, slowly. "But you will have to perform a miracle to ride to Fort Griffin and back in twelve hours. Why, the distance there and back is a hundred and eighty miles."

"Yes, but that is only fifteen miles an hour. I will have a fresh horse every thirty miles, you know. I know my own horse can beat that all hollow, but I wouldn't want to shove him to his utmost any further than thirty miles. I want him fresh when I get back to Creeksville."

"But you won't have the cavalry with you, for they couldn't keep that up for five hours."

"Well, I want to get back and see how things are, you know. When I do come back the cavalry will not be far away. It may be that I will meet some of the soldiers, you know."

"That is possible. They are liable to be heading this way now. If they have heard that the Utes have gathered in this vicinity they will surely be coming. But I am afraid they have not heard it."

Wild knew it was a pretty sure thing that the redskins would attack the fort before sunrise, so he got ready for the relay race he was going to ride.

He advised the lieutenant to call all the settlers and their families inside the stockade right away, and to fetch all the provisions and what they desired to save from their cabins with them.

Lieutenant Ainsworth acted on the advice.

The contents of the store was brought inside the block house, too, and then they were ready to stand a siege.

A brook trickled right through the enclosure, so they would have plenty of water for themselves and horses.

It was past midnight when all arrangements had been made.

The frightened women and children huddled together and the men went about with pale, set faces.

There were just twenty-five men to defend the fort, counting Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart.

Young Wild West would have to leave them to ride his relay race for help.

CHAPTER V.

WILD ARRIVES AT FORT GRIFFIN.

It was just about ten minutes before dawn that a fierce yell rang out all around the stockade of Fort Feather.

It did not come as a surprise to the waiting men, for Young Wild West had discovered that the Utes were approaching nearly an hour before.

The dashing young deadshot decided not to leave the fort until he had seen what sort of a move the besieged party would make in the way of holding the fort.

"We want to make them understand that they are not going to have an easy thing of it," he said to the lieutenant, and that officer nodded.

He was a brave young man, was Lieutenant Ainsworth, and he was not the one to desert his post as long as he could lift a hand in its defense.

When the fierce yell sounded every man was on the alert.

The redskins would storm the stockade from several points at once, Wild knew, and it was for the men with the field pieces to train them where they would do the most good.

"The best thing to do is to let them break a hole in the stockade, and then as they come through give it to them," he said.

The lieutenant nodded and gave his instructions accordingly.

No a shot was fired from the fort, though the redskins sent a storm of bullets at the block house the instant their warwhoop had sounded.

The demons had axes with them, for they could be heard cutting at the logs that were driven in the ground to form the stockade.

"Let them cut," said Wild, calmly.

For ten minutes the cutting was kept up and then the stout stakes gave way.

At the same moment several Indians began climbing over in two other places.

Though it was still dark, their forms could be seen.

Wild set the emigrants at work picking them off.

"Make every shot tell," he said; "don't pull a trigger unless you are certain the bullet is going to land in the body of a redskin somewhere."

Just then there was a yell that echoed over the plains, and a bunch of the redskins surged through the opening they had made in the stockade.

Bang!

One of the field pieces thundered and the slugs it had been loaded with went true to the mark.

This sufficed to dampen the spirits of the Indians somewhat, and they withdrew in double-quick order.

Young Wild West nodded.

"That was all right," he said to the lieutenant. "Just keep that kind of work up. Don't load the pieces with the balls, but use slugs right along. The range is short, and you can do ten times the damage."

Then he walked over to where his partners were engaged in instructing the party old Dave Burlew was in charge of.

"Well, boys, I am off," he said. "I will see you again before dark to-night, I hope. You keep the redskins off till I get back. It is going to be a relay race that I ride, and if the horse I get hold of are only half as good as Spitfire I'll win! Good-by!"

"Good-by, Wild!" said Jim.

"Look out fur ther measly coyotes when yer go out," Charlie added.

Wild's sorrel stallion was ready and waiting, and waving an adieu to his partners, he mounted and rode for the gate of the stockade.

It was opened for him, and out he dashed.

He was just in time to see the Utes firing the log houses of the settlers, but he paid little attention to them.

That was something he had expected to happen before this.

He was a hundred yards from the stockade before he was discovered by the redskins, and then, as a dozen of them galloped after him, he uttered a shout of defiance and let the noble animal go at the top of his speed.

A few shots were fired at him, but they all fell short, and not bothering to answer them he kept on.

The redskins followed him for about fifteen minutes, and then finding themselves outdistanced they gave up the chase.

When day broke Young Wild West was more than five miles from Fort Feather and riding like the wind.

This was kept up all the way to Creekville, and when he arrived there the dashing young deadshot halted in front of the tavern and cried out:

"I want a fresh horse, and a good one! I am riding to Fort Griffin for help. Fort Feather is surrounded by three hundred Utes, and there are only twenty-five men and a lot of women and children there to defend it. Hurry up, there!"

A likely-looking gray mustang was brought out and the change was quickly made.

"Get what men you can together and ride over to the fort, when I send some more from Blackbird," he called out. "Take good care of my horse, and have him ready when I come back."

Then he was off on the relay race again.

The mustang was a good one, as he found out when he had tried him for ten miles of the race.

Another five miles and then the dashing young deadshot, who was riding to save the lives of those at Fort Feather, suddenly beheld a band of perhaps fifty redskins riding across the prairie in the direction of the besieged fort.

They were making a detour, so as to keep clear of the settlement, though why it was they did not attack it Wild did not know.

It must be that they have arranged, through the medium of scouts and runners, to destroy Fort Feather," he muttered, as he rode on.

But the Indians had spied him, and they no doubt divined that he was riding for help, since they could easily tell that he was heading for Fort Griffin.

Like a thunderclod they bore down toward him.

"I guess I had better let you fellows know that I can shoot a little," he muttered, and, swinging in the saddle, he brought his rifle to his shoulder and took a quick aim at the foremost of the redskins.

Cra-ang!

As the report rang out one of them threw up his hands and fell from the saddle.

Cra-ang!

Again the young deadshot fired and another one dropped.

That caused them to slacken their speed, and, with a laugh, Young Wild West rode on.

He was soon out of range, for the mustang stuck right to his work.

In one hour and fifty minutes from the time he left Creekville Wild was at Blackbird.

He halted in front of the blacksmith shop, where half a dozen men were congregated.

"Get a party together and ride for Fort Feather," he shouted. "The Utes are besieging it. You will find men ready to go with you when you get to Creekville. Get me a fresh horse right away, and a good one, too! Hurry! I must get to Fort Griffin and bring back the cavalry to save Fort Feather!"

"Here's as good a nag as was ever straddled, pard!" exclaimed a cowboy, as he led out a tough little bay. "He's jest been shod, an' he's ready ter go like chain lightning!"

"Good!" and with wonderful quickness Young Wild West leaped from the back of the tired mustang and mounted the fresh pony.

He was away like a shot, scarcely losing three minutes for the stop.

Wild did not feel a bit tired.

With the fresh horse under him he felt that he would not be more than two hours, at the most, in reaching Fort Griffin.

In spite of what the cowboy had said about the horse, Wild soon found that it was not as good a one as he had left at the blacksmith shop.

But it was as good as the average, and that meant that he could cover thirty miles in two hours.

The trail was pretty even, and that would help out.

He found out the gait that best suited the pony and let him take it.

Wild urged the pony to his best the last five miles of the race to Fort Griffin.

When he got there the pony was exhausted, but he was as cool and tireless himself as though he had not ridden further than a mile.

"Who is in charge here?" he asked a sentry, as he dashed up to the fort and halted.

"Colonel Fortier," was the reply.

"I must see him at once. The Utes, three hundred strong, have surrounded Fort Feather, and there are only twenty-five men there, all told, to defend it."

"If you bear a message from the fort give it to me and I will see that it is delivered."

Wild slid from the back of his pony.

"Stand aside!" he cried. "I am in a hurry. It means life or death for men, women and innocent children."

CHAPTER VI.

WILD FINDS THE CAVALRY.

"I don't care what it means," retorted the man on guard duty, who was a stout man with a florid face. "The general is taking a nap just now, but if you give me a message addressed to him I'll see to it that he gets it."

"The message I have I will tell to him, so just stand out of the way and let me pass. I am Young Wild West."

"It makes no difference who you are! You can't go to the general's quarters until he gives permission."

"Can't, eh? We'll see about that!"

As quick as a flash Wild pushed him aside and darted through the gateway, before which the man had been parading up and down.

But the guard was not to be fooled that way.

He wanted more than that to settle him.

He lowered his musket, so the bayonet was leveled straight at the boy, and made a rush for him.

There is not the least doubt but that he would have run him through if Wild had let him do it.

But the dashing young deadshot easily avoided the thrust. Then, before the sentry could recover his balance, he sent out a straight right with his fist and caught him on the forehead.

As the man staggered back Wild gave him a left in the pit of his stomach.

He knew he had to thrash the fellow to make him keep out of his way.

"Help!" shouted the sentry as he went down.

His cry brought half a dozen soldiers to the scene.

"Seize that hoy and put him in the guard house!" the fellow who had been knocked down cried out wildly. "He tried to kill me!"

The soldiers were about to obey, but they quailed when they saw a revolver in Wild's hand.

"I want to see the commander of Fort Griffin!" he exclaimed; "and I will shoot the first galoot that interferes with me before I do see him!"

"Why, hello! It's Young Wild West!" said a soldier wearing the stripes of a corporal. "Boys, I guess he can go where he pleases, for I think he has the document with him that says so."

Wild recognized the corporal's face, but he could not call him by name just then.

"Corporal," said he, "I must see General Fortier at once. It is important that all the cavalymen he can spare should get to Fort Feather without delay. The fort is besieged by Utes, three hundred in number, and there is no telling how long they can hold out. He knows about how many men there are there."

"I guess you can see him, Young Wild West," was the reply. "Come with me."

But the sentry, who was now on his feet, raised objections.

"Put him in the guardhouse!" he shouted.

"I'll thrash that fellow before I leave," said Wild, "and I am going to leave pretty soon, too."

Just then who should appear on the scene but the general himself.

Wild had never met him before, so he quickly produced the document signed by the major-general, which he always carried in a small leather case.

This paper gave Young Wild West the privilege of going and coming where and when he pleased among the military posts of the Far West.

"Never mind that," said the general, waving his hand; "I heard the last of what you were saying just now. What is the trouble?"

The young dead-shot told him quickly.

The general's brow clouded and he shrugged his shoulders uneasily.

"I am sorry," said he, shaking his head, "but we received word that the redskins were gathering at a point fifty miles down the river, and I despatched Captain Darius and his troops, together with all the reserved forces here, to the scene. They set out this morning."

"Down the river, you say, general?"

"Yes."

"Good! I will overtake them, then, for I am going back to Blackbird right away. From there I will ride to Creekville, and then by heading toward the river in a straight line I will be able to head them off. I would like to have a fresh horse, general."

"You shall have the best we have here."

Then he took the document Wild had in his hand and hurriedly looked it over.

"Young Wild West, the scout, eh?" he observed. "Well, I am glad to meet you. Anything you ask for you shall have."

"Well, I should like to ask one thing of you."

"What is it?"

"I want to thrash that sentry of yours for trying to run me through with a bayonet, and I want you to let him off without punishment."

"He tried to run his bayonet through you, did he?"

"Yes, general. But I don't want him punished according to military rules. I promised to thrash him, and I am anxious to keep my word."

"Do it, then. I will look on. Your horse will be here by the time you have done it."

The sentry was astonished when he heard this from the commander of the fort.

But he was not a coward, and he scowled as Wild came out of the gate toward him.

"Put down that gun!" said the boy, commandingly.

"I am not under your orders, sir," was the stiff reply.

Wild sprang forward and seized the gun.

A quick twist and it was wrenched from the soldier's hands.

The general stood looking on, with folded arms.

He was a man who liked to see things done up in right shape, and as he was the boss there he was going to see the soldier thrashed.

He had heard enough of Young Wild West to make him have the opinion that the boy was capable of thrashing any ordinary man, and surely that was all the sentry was.

Wild meant to humble the fellow, as well as make him feel the weight of a few blows.

He slapped him on the cheek as he pulled the gun away from him and exclaimed:

"If you will apologize I will let up on you, as I haven't much time."

Whiz!

Instead of apologizing, the soldier shot out his fist and Wild felt the wind of it as he ducked.

Biff!

Our hero landed one on his left cheek and sent him staggering.

Spat! he followed with a right swing that caught him between the eyes and down he went.

The sentry was too dazed to get up right away, and, turning to the corporal, who was the only officer present, the general said:

"Relieve the guard and have him placed in the guardhouse immediately."

"Don't punish him, general," said Wild, as he saw a horse being brought to him. "I must be off. I hope to overtake the cavalry and be in time to save Fort Feather."

The general waved his hand and Wild leaped in the saddle.

It was a good fresh horse, and without stopping to eat anything at the fort, the dashing young Prince of the Saddle rode off, having remained there less than fifteen minutes.

He looked at his watch and found that he had spent six hours, less ten minutes, since he had started from Fort Feather.

"I'll eat my dinner at Blackbird, and it won't take me ten minutes to do it, either," he muttered, as the horse galloped along for all it was worth.

Wild certainly put that horse through.

He only stopped once on the thirty-mile trail from Fort Griffin to Blackbird.

When he reached the settlement he halted in front of the blacksmith shop and found another fresh horse waiting for him.

The people had made ready for him, for they realized that he was riding to save lives, and that he would want to get back to Fort Feather as soon as possible.

Wild paused long enough to eat a sandwich and drink a couple of cups of milk, and during that time he learned that thirty armed men had gone to Creekville to join those who were going to help drive the Utes from Fort Feather.

The cowboy who had loaned him the horse was gone, so Wild left word that his horse was at Fort Griffin, and that he could exchange the one he now left for it when he had time to ride over.

Then he went on his mad dash to save the fort.

The last horse was the worst of any he had ridden so far, and when he got to Creekville he found that he had taken up four hours and a half in the sixty miles he had covered on the way back.

"Never mind," he thought; "I can't get back to the fort in twelve hours, as I told them I would, because I must find the cavalry before I go there. I'll take my own noble Spitfire now, and then I will feel at home, and know just what I can do. Sixty miles won't hurt him in a day, not with the rest he has had."

He found that the sorrel had been rubbed down in a thorough manner, and that the best of care otherwise had been given him.

"Hello, old fellow!" called out Wild, as the sorrel was brought out. "I'm just as glad to see you as you are to see me. You thought I had deserted you for another, I suppose. But that will never be, old boy!"

Then he took a short run around to limber himself up, for he was getting a little stiff by this time, and vaulted upon the back of his own trusty steed.

The quality of endurance was one of the greatest that Young Wild West possessed.

Wild rode in a straight line for Green River now.

He followed no trail whatever, but rode over hill and dale at the speed that Spitfire could hold the longest.

When he had covered twenty miles, and could see nothing of the cavalry yet, he grew a little worried.

He was easily twenty miles from the fort, too, which lay below him to his right.

But there was a rock ridge five miles ahead, and there was no telling but that the cavalry might be riding along the other side of that.

Wild headed for the ridge, which was well wooded.

He reached it, and finding a defile started through it.

He had not covered more than a quarter of a mile when he heard the cracking of firearms not far away.

The sounds came from the other side of the ridge, it seemed, so he kept right on.

Two minutes later he came in sight of half a dozen painted redskins riding as though for their lives.

There was an open stretch just ahead, and as he dashed out after the fleeing Utes he heard the thunder of hoofs coming from a direction almost parallel with that which he had been riding.

He craned his neck and looked around to the right and beheld the blue uniforms of troopers riding through a gorge.

They were the cavalymen he had been looking for so long.

As Young Wild West saw the approaching cavalymen he swung his hat in the air and shouted:

"Fort Feather is besieged by the redskins! I am riding the finish of a relay race to save the garrison. Come on!"

A cheer went up from those in the lead, for some of them had heard and understood his words.

The sorrel stallion leaped over the body of a slain redskin and took the lead of the cavalry horses.

Spitfire was right in his element now.

He had been racing against time, but now he probably thought that it was up to him to beat the cavalry horses, something he could do with the greatest of ease.

But Wild held him in check and got alongside the captain in charge of the men.

He found him to be Captain Darius, of Fort Feather, and in a few words he made known the situation to him.

"To Fort Feather, boys!" cried the captain, waving his sword."

Then as they headed down the river, which could be seen in the distance, he told our hero how they had come upon a few Indians, and, seeing that they were in war paint, they had given pursuit and scattered them.

"Well, you will have a harder time scattering those at Fort Feather, I think," Wild answered. "But I guess we'll manage to do it. If Lieutenant Ainsworth and my two partners have been able to hold the fort everything will be all right."

CHAPTER VII.

THE FIGHT AT FORT FEATHER.

As soon as Young Wild West had gone Lieutenant Ainsworth came over to Cheyenne Charlie and said:

"I shall rely upon you and Dart to help me out and advise me in this business. Since Young Wild West has gone off on his relay race for help. You folks know more about Indian warfare than I do, though I have had quite a little experience myself. The fiends have got their attention drawn to your partner now, and some of them are riding after him. I hope they don't catch him."

"Don't worry about that," answered the scout, with a chuckle. "No Injun ever owned a horse what could catch that sorrel. Wild will soon leave 'em behind."

"You may bet on that," Jim added.

There was a lull in the shooting until it got daylight.

The Utes had failed in their attempt to get into the stockade under the cover of the darkness, and now they were conjuring up some other plan of action.

As it gradually grew light the besieged party felt better.

They would now be able to see, and that would enable them to shoot straight at their painted foes.

Charlie and Jim knew quite well that the redskins would be watching to pick off the men from a distance, so they advised them to keep well under cover.

Gradually it became lighter, and then the Indians took up the firing again.

But their bullets were wasted.

They had congregated in a little grove that was not more than two hundred feet square and only a hundred yards from the fort.

The trees would form them quite a protection, and when the lieutenant saw how nicely they were stationed a frown came over his face.

It was never thought that an attacking party would get as close to the block house as that, I guess, or those trees would never have been left standing," he observed.

The three rather antiquated field pieces that belonged to the fort were trained toward the break in the stockade, and crouching behind the barricade of logs, the gunners waited for the order to use them.

"Them's ther things what'll do ther business," remarked the scout, smiling grimly. "If you've got powder an' slugs enough, lieutenant, I reckon we kin keep 'em off till Wild comes back."

"We have plenty of powder," was the retort. "but the slugs are not very plentiful. We have balls for the pieces."

"Well, there's plenty of nails in them kegs ther store-keeper an' his help rolled in here, ain't there?"

"Yes, there are plenty of nails."

"Well, they'll do, then. Nails is fine ter shoot out of a cannon at short range."

The store and the cabins, which had been fired before it got daylight, were still burning, though most of them were in ruins now.

The families that had occupied them were heart-sick at the sight, but Charlie and Jim went around among them and told them there was plenty of timber to be had close by, and that they hoped they would not have to shoot all the nails belonging to the storekeeper into the ranks of the redskins.

This sort of talk cheered them up, and when some one suggested that men could not fight very well on an empty stomach the women took the hint and began to prepare breakfast.

Half the men were given their breakfast while the other half kept a watch on the redskins.

When the first lot had finished they relieved the waiting ones and they had their turn.

The women worked faithfully to supply their every want, for they knew the defenders of the fort must eat well to keep up their strength.

It was just as the sun came up that the breakfast was eaten by the men, and after that they went out ready to fight.

The Indians were getting ready, too, for they were now mounting their ponies.

They evidently meant to ride through the break in the stockade this time and storm the block house from the backs of their ponies.

"Come on, boys?" cried Cheyenne Charlie. "We'll meet 'em an' give 'em fits!"

With Jim at his side, the scout started for the break.

Behind them came Dave Burlew and the eight men belonging to the wagon train.

The troopers, under command of Lieutenant Ainsworth, moved off to the left to rake the Utes as they approached.

Five minutes later the attack began.

Fully two hundred mounted redskins started for the stockade, yelling and firing as they rode.

The lieutenant remained wonderfully cool, and when he thought they were close enough to make the fire telling he gave the word.

The ripping, cracking sound the rifles made awoke the echoes, and when the lieutenant saw the advancing Indians waver in the front ranks he knew the cavalymen had not shot wildly.

They were firing at the Utes from an angle, and volley after volley was poured into them.

Young Wild West's partners held the men they had down until the redskins were within fifty feet of the stockade.

Then Cheyenne Charlie gave the word to fire.

Straight into the ranks of the Indians went the death-dealing bullets, and horses and men went down in a heap, almost entirely blocking the way for those who were surging along behind in the mad charge to capture the wooden fort.

Three times the men fired, and then, at a word from the scout, they broke and ran out of the way.

Cheyenne Charlie waved his hat to the gunners now, and they understood.

Bang—bang—bang!

The three pieces spoke, one after the other in quick succession, and as the Ute warriors were struggling to get through the opening over the tops of the fallen stockade, they made a good target.

The effect was disastrous to the Indians and sickening to the whites who looked on.

Such slaughter as that was not to the liking of the majority of them, but they all realized that there was no other way to keep from falling into the hands of the savage horde.

A huge hole was torn through the mounted body of warriors and then the smoke settled, so they could scarcely be seen.

A few tried to come through and make for the fort, but they were seen, and two volleys sent back those who escaped the bullets.

In just ten minutes from the time the Indians started on their ride from the little grove the shooting stopped.

The second attack had been resisted and many were the Ute warriors that went to the Happy Hunting Grounds during that brief interval.

"I guess that'll do 'em fur a while," observed the scout, grimly, as he wiped the perspiration from his brow. "But they'll try it half a dozen times yet, if there's any of 'em left by that time. I reckon we must have cleaned up about fifty of 'em since we started in."

"And only two men wounded on our side," added the lieutenant, hopefully. "We stand a very good chance of holding the fort, providing the Utes are not reinforced."

"That is likely ter happen, but I hope it won't," answered Charlie. "Hello! There goes a signal now!"

Sure enough, a thin column of smoke was ascending from the little grove.

And a minute or two later there were two more of them close to the first.

"That means for any of the Utes in sight to come here at once," observed Jim.

The lieutenant looked uneasy again.

As the fighting had ceased for a time, he gave orders for the barricade near the block house to be strengthened, and then all the logs that could be found were brought into play.

Loop-holes were left, so if they were forced to stay behind it, before making a final retreat into the block house, they could pick off the Indians without running much chance of being hit themselves.

The three columns of smoke continued to rise for the space of several minutes.

Charlie and Jim scanned the horizon, but failed to see any answer to the signal.

This caused them to feel better, for they knew the redskins were asking for help, and that meant that they knew they would have a tough time of it as they were.

The morning wore on without any further fighting, except now and then a shot at long range.

At length some of the men ventured out to the smoking ruins of the store and cabins.

There was nothing there that could be saved, except a few logs, and these were dragged in to strengthen the barricade.

This had just about been accomplished when the sharp eyes of Jim Dart detected a band of Indians approaching from the West.

They were the same crowd that Young Wild West had met, and it must have been that they had headed farther south than the fort lay, or they would have got there before.

"There is half a hundred more of them," said Jim, quietly. "They will make up for those who went under this morning. I suppose."

"Yes, an' I don't like it a bit," retorted Charlie. "Ther red galoots mean business, I reckon, an' they're goin' ter make it warm fur us afore they're through. They won't ride up in a bunch ther next time they come. They'll spread out an' come fur all parts of ther stockade et once; see if they don't. When an Injun gits downed at one thing he always tries some other way."

The band knew just where to go, so they made a wide detour to keep out of range of the fort and finally brought up at the grove.

"I reckon now is a good time ter mow down some of them trees, lieutenant," said Charlie. "We want ter let the red galoots know that we're ready fur business."

"Very well," was the reply; "I will do as you say."

Orders were given to train the guns on the grove, and that they be loaded with the regular balls that fitted them.

When all was in readiness the bombardment began.

The first three shots did very little damage, but when two more had been fired the Indians were seen to scatter and ride out on the prairie.

"I reckon ther galoots didn't have much time ter tell ther newcomers what had happened," observed the scout. "Jest pile it inter 'em a couple of times more."

Bang—bang—bang!

The guns were turned loose again, and the trees in the grove shivered, while wild yells went up from the Utes.

"I guess that'll make 'em know that we ain't asleep," chuckled Cheyenne Charlie.

But though it did considerable damage to them, it only made the Indians make another attack all the sooner.

They spread out in a huge fan and came tearing toward the fort a few minutes later, yelling and firing as they came.

Of course none of their shots took effect, for the garrison was to well protected.

There was only one way to get possession of the block house, and that was to rush right up to it and engage the defenders hand to hand.

And that is just what the Utes meant to do now.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE UTES TAKE A PRISONER.

"Charlie, I guess it is going to be a little longer fight this time," observed Jim Dart, as he watched for a chance to get a shot at the redskins, who were now riding in a circle about the fort enclosure.

The red demons were practicing the old trick of lying close to their horses' necks, and gradually nearing the object of attack as they rode in a narrowing circle.

"All right," answered the scout. "If it is goin' ter be a long fight we'll have ter put up with it, that's all. There's a good many of 'em, I know, but there'll be a blamed sight less of 'em afore we git through."

"Yes, but will there be enough less of them to make it do us any good? Wild is hardly at Fort Griffin by this time, even if everything has worked right with him."

"We'll come out of it all right, see if we don't. Jest go an' pick out four or five of ther best shots ther lieutenant has got in his crowd, an' we'll go up in ther block house an' pick off some of ther red galoots."

Jim said no more, but hastened to do as the scout suggested.

He soon came back with four of the men stationed at the fort, and then the six of them sought a place where they could fire at the circling savages without showing themselves up as targets.

The four soldiers proved to be marksmen of no mean calibre, and the saddles of the horses began to empty as fast as they fired.

Charlie and Jim never missed a shot. They kept right at it, and realizing that they were losing men all the time the Utes began to ride straight for the stockade.

They came from all sides at once, and then it was that the lieutenant gave his men the word to fire.

Volley after volley was poured into the ranks of the advancing redskins, but they came right on, and soon the whole crowd was close to the stockade wall.

They were now partly protected by the posts that formed the stockade, and when they dismounted and crouched around it in a double line it looked as though nothing could save the brave band of whites now.

"Git all ther women an' children in ther block house!" shouted Cheyenne Charlie.

"They are all in but one," answered Alfred Graves, "and that is my daughter. She insists on making a stand with the men. Agnes, get inside! It is the orders!"

But the girl acted as though she did not hear him.

She was crouching behind the barricade, her rifle to her shoulder, and just then she sent a death-dealing bullet at the crowd of redskins that came surging through the break in the stockade wall.

"Ther gal is true blue," said the scout, with a nod of approval. "She's as good as any man you've got in ther bunch."

Over the wall the Indians came on all sides. The fire that was directed at them was fierce, but it did not stay them.

"If we kin drive 'em back this time we'll be all right," said the scout. "Steady, there! Git them cannons ter work! It's slugs what ther red galoots want!"

The pieces spoke just then and in three different places the Indians fell like grain before the sledge.

But the gaps closed instantly, it seemed, and on they came.

Volley after volley was fired, but it did not stop the rush. The Utes were forgetful of the fact that they were suffering a great loss and they came right on.

It was a fearful slaughter, but the redskins were in such numbers that it made little difference.

Some of them were bound to get there, and that meant that it was time for the brave defenders to take to the block house.

Cheyenne Charlie reluctantly gave this advice.

He saw that they could not check the advance of the red fiends, for they were swarming from all sides.

Once in the block house, they could hold them off indefinitely, providing they did not succeed in setting fire to it.

So into the fortification they rushed, firing one last volley as they did so.

They had barely got there and shut the huge oaken door when a scream sounded from the outside.

"My daughter!" cried Graves. "The Indians have got her!" Jim Dart peered through a loop-hole and saw that this was true.

Agnes Graves had been one of the last to leave the barricade and an Indian, more audacious than the rest had pounced upon her.

The capture of a white maiden was something great to them, and the brave knew it.

He struck her rifle from her hands and dragged her off behind his followers.

Yellow Snake, the head chief who was leading the attacking force, saw what the brave had done, and he promptly ordered him to take the girl back to the shelter of the grove, where there were some wounded Indians.

The girl, though very brave and determined during the fight, was frightened beyond measure at the sudden turn of affairs, and she screamed loudly for help.

But there was no use in that, for the redskin had secured her arms to her sides and he was bearing her away from the fort.

In the smoke of the battle this was easy for him to do, and as the brave girl looked back and found she could no longer see the fort she gave herself up as lost.

Into the little grove she was carried, and there she found that the Utes had dug a hollow to shield themselves from the cannon balls.

The soil was sandy and they had dug a long, wide trench about four feet in depth.

It was here that the wounded were being cared for by two medicine men, who had been pressed into service by Yellow Snake.

There were perhaps twenty of the wounded, altogether, and many dead bodies were scattered among the trees.

At any other time the sight would have been a sickening one to the girl, but just then she was so frightened at her own peril that she hardly noticed anything that came before her range of vision.

The brave who had captured her was really nothing more than a young buck, who bore the name of Big Tomahawk.

It was the first fight with the palefaces he had ever been in, and he had distinguished himself greatly that day by his bravery.

But the capture of the paleface maiden was bound to add to his glory, and he knew it.

The wounded Indians looked at him with indifference as he brought his prize to the excavation and coolly tied her to a log.

They were stoical, and though they appeared not to notice anything that went on, they knew that their forces had scored a triumph by making the capture.

It took the girl fully five minutes to come back to something like her normal state of mind.

Though she had been rather roughly handled, she had not been harmed so far, and that made her have hopes of getting out of the scrape she had fallen in.

"Ugh!" said her captor, as he squatted on the ground before her; "paleface maiden heap much nice."

"Lef me go back to the fort!" she cried, trembling at the glance the red man shot at her.

"Paleface maiden no go back to fort; fort be burned putty soon," was the reply.

"No, it won't!" she exclaimed, defiantly. "The Utes will never get the best of the people at the fort. They will be sorry for their work to-day. If you want to save yourself from the soldiers when they come you had better let me go. Give me your name, and I will try and not have you punished for what you have done."

"Ugh!" said Big Tomahawk, not knowing what else to say just then.

"You have made a big mistake," went on Agnes, gaining courage as she spoke. "The Utes are not strong enough to whip the white men. They will be badly beaten, and then those who don't get killed will be put in prison."

The young buck shook his head.

Then he got up and said something to one of the medicine men in his own language, after which he started back for the scene of the battle, no doubt looking for more glory.

But when the redskin got back there he found that the tide had turned, for the palefaces inside the block house had driven the Utes off.

Though some of them were under the cover of the outside of the barricade, they were there more for the purpose of protection than they were for fighting.

They had lost heavily, and had enough of it for the present.

But Big Tomahawk was reckless, and he rushed forward and tried to urge the redskins to rush up to the block house.

That was where his glory came to a sudden end, for a bullet struck him in the center of his forehead and he dropped without having time to utter his death-cry.

Gradually the redskins were forced back and soon they were beating a retreat for the grove.

Yellow Snake had not been wounded, though he had been in the thickest of the fray.

It was toward the middle of the afternoon when he thought it about time to stop and find out how they stood, and as he got back to the hole in the grove his face wore anything but a satisfied expression.

For an hour after that the wounded came limping in, and there was a sort of gloom in the Indian camp.

All this time Agnes Graves had remained tied to the log, none of the redskins paying particular attention to her.

But when the chief found that he had lost over a hundred in killed and fifty wounded, he took time to pay his respects to the fair captive.

It had occurred to him that he would win the fort through the girl.

"Paleface maiden got friends in fort?" he asked, looking at her.

"Yes, my father and mother are there," was the reply in a trembling voice, for she had no idea of what was coming. "Good! She wants to see them again."

"Yes, I want to see them again," said Agnes, her hopes rising.

"Paleface maiden write a note to soldiers at fort. She say that if palefaces no surrender she will be killed and her scalp sent to them."

The girl understood.

"But you would not kill me if they did not surrender, would you?" she asked, anxiously.

"Yes, me kill paleface maiden very quick," was the reply. "I will write what you want me to," she said, thinking it best to humor him.

Yellow Snake nodded.

Then he found a piece of paper and the stub of a pencil and ordered the girl's right hand to be freed.

Before she began to write he looked at her and said:

"Palefaces will lose anyhow when dark comes, so they better surrender. If they surrender Yellow Snake will let paleface maiden go with her father and mother. All rest of paleface men must die! Write that, paleface maid."

With a hand that trembled not a little, the girl wrote to the effect of what he said.

Then she added:

"Don't agree to this, for I am sure the chief will not have me killed. He is only trying to scare you into surrendering. Keep at it the way you have been, for Young Wild West will soon be back with help, and then you can save me."

Then the chief made her read what she had written, or the part she wanted him to hear, and then he took the note and gave it to one of his braves, who stood with a white handkerchief, ready to sally forth and deliver the note.

The captive girl could not see him after he went away, but in about ten minutes he came back, shaking his head in the negative.

"Palefaces say wait till to-night; then they send answer," was the report.

Yellow Snake was not satisfied with this.

But he did not know what course to pursue.

The other chief had been badly wounded and was lying unconscious, so he could not consult with him.

He decided to call a council of the leading braves, however, and it was done immediately.

It took them nearly an hour to decide what was to be done.

They thought that it would be after midnight if help came to the besieged ones, so they concluded to wait until sunset and then give the palefaces a chance to surrender. If they failed to do it then they would cut the girl's scalp lock off and send it to the fort by shooting it over the stockade wall with an arrow.

Then hostilities would be resumed, and with the darkness to aid them, they hoped to take Fort Feather.

CHAPTER IX.

WILD REACHES THE FORT.

It was pretty close to sunset when Young Wild West, riding along at the head of a hundred and fifty cavalymen, came in sight of Fort Feather.

All appeared to be quiet there just then, but it did not take him long to discover the headquarters of the Indians in the grove.

"Hurrah!" he cried; "they have held the fort against them, Captain Darius. We will be in time, after all! My relay race wasn't for nothing, after all!"

They were riding along the edge of a timber patch just then, so it was hardly likely that they could be seen from the fort unless some one had a glass turned that way.

"If you think everything is all right there we will halt and give the horses a rest, so they will be in trim for the charge upon the Utes," said the captain.

"A good idea, captain," Wild retorted. "Here is as good a place as any. It is only about five miles from the fort, so you can come when the horses have rested for half an hour. I will go on. If the redskins see me they will think I have come back alone, and that I failed to get the help I want after."

"You had better not try to reach the fort alone. Those red fiends would head you off before you got there. They must be keeping a watch around, and they could see you before you got a mile from here."

"Well, I will make a circle off to the left, and then if they do try to get me I'll show them that Spitfire isn't completely tired out yet. He has covered a good sixty miles to-day, but he can beat anything the Utes have got, I'll bet!"

Captain Darius said no more.

"I think it probable that the redskins are waiting for it to get dark, so they can try another attack on the fort," Wild resumed. "It looks to me as though they have fared pretty hard, but the fact that they have located near it makes it pretty certain that they haven't given it up as a bad job yet."

"I tell you what you had better do, Young Wild West," said the captain, after he had thought for a minute; "you just wait here ten minutes, and then we'll all ride over together. We will turn off to the left here and get the timber strip between us and the redskins. We can get pretty close to the fort before they see us, then."

"Well, all right," answered our hero. "I consider that my relay race was done when I found you, so I may as well rest here for ten minutes. I am so stiff from riding that I wouldn't dare to lie down just now. I have got to exercise my limbs considerable before I do that. It is a long ride to Fort Griffin and back."

"You bet it is! It would take a man three or four days to make the distance on one horse."

"That would depend a great deal upon what kind of a horse he had. I could do it quicker with my sorrel."

"And you did it in twelve hours by changing horses five times!"

"Yes, and the last time I changed horses I took the one that had carried me over the first thirty miles of the distance."

"It don't seem possible. They say it is ninety miles from Fort Feather to Fort Griffin."

"Well, if it isn't quite that distance I consider that I did well," said Wild.

The boy was tired out, for it had been a severe strain on him to ride as he had since dawn.

But he would not give in.

He meant to see the finish.

He felt joyful to think that the fort had not been taken by the Utes, and he now was certain that the redskins would be put to rout in short order.

With the cavalymen he had at his back he was positive that he could clean out the whole lot of them in double-quick time.

They waited a little more than ten minutes.

The sun was less than half an hour high now.

"Come on," Wild said; "we may as well get to the fort before the sun goes down."

"Had we better go there first?" the captain asked.

"Yes, I think so. It will be a good idea to find out just how matters stand before we attack the redskins. They will put up a fight, never fear. They won't try to get away. The chances are that they have lost heavily, and an Indian always wants revenge, you know."

"All right; just as you say, Young Wild West."

"The chances are that those you scattered just before I met you have reached the camp by this time, for I see nothing of them. They will let their friends know that the cavalry is coming, anyhow, so it would make little difference whether they saw us or not."

"We will start right away, then. Forward march!"

The troopers set out at a gallop at the word of command and away they went behind the timber strip.

Young Wild West's face was a little drawn from the fatigue he had undergone, but his eyes were as bright as ever.

He was ready to fight the redskins, and the thought that he had brought the cavalymen in time made him feel as strong as ever.

The timber would shield them from view until they got within two miles of the fort, and then if the Utes took a notion to come out and try to head them off they were welcome to do it.

Wild had an idea that they would do this, for they would be apt to think that if the two forces of white men were joined it would go all the harder for them.

If they could defeat the cavalry in a quick engagement their chances would be good for taking the fort.

In a few minutes the troopers rode out into full view of those at the fort and the Indians in the grove.

Their bright uniforms and glittering trappings showed up finely in the rays of the sinking sun.

The tattered flag was still flying from the high staff at the fort, and as they headed straight for it the flag was dipped to welcome them.

Young Wild West waved his hat, for he knew some one must be looking through a field glass.

Then the flag was dipped again.

Our hero was elated.

The garrison had held out against the enemy and now the finish would soon be at hand.

The fight at Fort Feather would soon be over and victory would rest with the brave defenders.

The cavalymen joined in a cheer when Young Wild West proposed it.

Their voices echoed over the prairie and reached the ears of the redskins.

When the troopers were half way from the timber to the fort nearly two hundred of the Utes came riding out to meet them.

They had barely got in range of the guns of the block house when one of the pieces spoke and a gap was cut in the ranks of the red demons.

"That was a pretty good shot!" exclaimed Young Wild West. "Now, captain, just get your men ready for some hot work. Those fellows seem to be pretty daring. They are full of the war spirit, I guess."

"They won't be so full of it when we get through," was the grim rejoinder.

Captain Darius was an experienced Indian fighter, and he got ready for business in a hurry.

So well was his horse trained that he let the reins lie on his neck.

The Utes were spread out in fan-shape and coming toward them with their horses on a run.

The captain waited until the redskins had fired three volleys before he gave the command to fire.

Then a volley rang out, as only a volley fired by trained soldiers can.

Horses were emptied right and left, but there were determined warriors to fill up the gap, and on they came.

In just two minutes it was over for the time.

The Indians could not stand the awful firing and they turned and fled for the shelter of the little grove.

With the ringing cheers of the cavalymen sounding in their ears, they rode for their lives.

Young Wild West turned and rode straight for the fort.

Captain Darius gave the command and then his forces turned and followed the dashing young Prince of the Saddle. Wild led them by a hundred yards when he reached the stockade gate.

His partners fled to meet him, and when he dismounted they hugged him with joy.

The women cried with joy and the children shouted.

But there were a man and woman there who were pale from fear.

They were Alfred Graves and his wife.

Their daughter was still held a prisoner by the Utes.

The Indians had not bothered the besieged party since the note from the girl was received, and they had been waiting anxiously.

Wild was quickly apprised of the facts.

"I will rescue the girl," he exclaimed; "but I want a little rubbing down first. Boys, I guess you will have to fix me up."

The last was said to his two partners, and they understood what was required of them.

They half carried the boy to a convenient spot and then they spent half an hour on him.

When they got through with him Wild called for a cup of coffee and something to eat.

Captain Darius was waiting to hold a consultation with him.

He had four scouts out watching the redskins, who were staying in the grove.

Darkness would soon be upon them, and they wanted to charge the redskins and have it over with while they could see to fight.

The bath and rubbing down that Wild had been subjected to made him feel like new, and he declared that he was ready as soon as he had finished eating his supper.

But the first thing he did was to look at his horse and make sure that he had been properly cared for.

"Well, Young Wild West, what are we going to do about it?" asked Captain Darius, as he came up, with Lieutenant Ainsworth.

"Well, captain, I think that the girl should be rescued before we make an attack on the redskins," was the reply.

"Then we will be unable to do it before dark?"

"Yes, it won't do to tackle them right now. They would probably kill the girl for satisfaction if we did."

"Do you think we can whip them easy after dark?"

"Yes, a few volleys and one charge will settle them. I wouldn't wonder if they have enough of it now."

Just then Cheyenne Charlie ran up to them and reported that a redskin was coming with a flag of truce.

"I will go out and meet him," said Wild.

He at once started for the break in the stockade, toward which the Ute was coming, a white handkerchief floating from the bayonet of a musket which he carried.

Young Wild West met him a hundred yards from the stockade.

It was now beginning to get dark, but the boy stood there in bold relief, as though he was simply waiting to greet a friend.

"Ugh!" said the Indian, as he paused before him.

"Ugh!" answered the young deadshot. "What is the trouble, redskin?"

"Mc come to say that big chief Yellow Snake will kill and scalp the paleface maiden if the soldiers no let Utes go back to reservation in peace."

"Is that so? So the chief admits he is licked, then? All right. You go back and tell Yellow Snake that if he harms one hair in the paleface maiden's head not one of his braves will escape. We will kill them all. Tell him that Young Wild West says so."

"You Young Wild West?" asked the brave, looking at the boy keenly.

"Yes, that happens to be my name. I mean what I say, too. I have heard of Yellow Snake and Yellow Snake has heard of me. Go back and tell him what I say."

Without another word, the redskin turned and walked back toward the grove.

Wild stood there with folded arms, his rifle hanging over his shoulder.

He was going to wait for the messenger to come back, so he could learn what Yellow Snake thought about it.

In a few minutes the report of a rifle sounded and a bullet whizzed past the head of Wild.

"Ah," he exclaimed, "so they mean fight, do they? All right!"

He placed his rifle to his shoulder in a hurry and sent a bullet for the point where the smoke of the shot came from.

CHAPTER X.

WILD SAVES THE GIRL, BUT GETS CAUGHT HIMSELF.

Wild's bullet found the mark, for the death-yell of an Indian sounded.

The young deadshot had such excellent judgment that he could generally hit the man who fired a shot, so long as he could see the smoke that came from the rifle.

The bush behind which the marksman was crouching had not saved him.

Strange to say, no other shots were fired at the boy.

He walked back to the waiting cavalymen and reported to the captain what the messenger with the flag of truce had said, and what he had told him in reply.

"I guess they have weakened," said the captain. "Good. Now, Young Wild West, if you can only find a way to save the girl before we make the attack, everything will be all right."

"I can find a way, but we will have to wait until it gets good and dark."

"Well, we will leave it to you, then."

"What do you propose to do, Mr. West?" asked Graves, looking at the young deadshot hopefully.

"I propose to go to the camp of the redskins and get your daughter away from them," was the reply. "My partners will help, and that is all I will need."

The majority of those who heard him shook their heads, as though they had their doubts about his being able to do it.

But Wild acted as though he meant what he said, and he did mean it, too.

He was going to disguise himself as an Indian and try to save the girl.

It was getting dark rapidly now.

The cavalymen were being fed, and they would be in good shape.

As soon as it was really dark Wild went out to where some of the bodies of the slain Indians lay and proceeded to make a selection of the garments they wore.

It was a rather greswome task, but he knew it was necessary, so he even cut off the long hair of one of the braves to help along the disguise.

Charlie and Jim helped him, and by the aid of some soft clay he made his face look like an Indian with the war paint on.

"I guess I will do now," he said, when he had finished with the disguise. "Now, boys, you go ahead and prepare the way for me. I will follow on behind, and if I once get to the trees over there I'll guarantee to do the work up right."

The three soon left the stockade, Charlie and Jim going a hundred feet ahead.

The two moved toward the grove cautiously, for they knew the redskin would be keeping a sharp watch in that direction.

Half way to it, they moved off to the right and Wild followed.

They were approaching the Indian camp from the upper side now, and if nothing happened they could make the distance in ten minutes as slowly as they were moving.

Things went along all right until they were within two hundred yards of the grove.

Then they suddenly came upon a brave, who was crouching in the tall grass.

But Charlie found him before the redskin knew of their presence, and with a bound he was upon him.

There was a short struggle, during which the Ute made no sound loud enough to be heard any distance, and then it was all over.

Charlie had caught him by the throat and choked off the cry that came to his lips.

The Indian had tried to stab him with his knife, so Charlie gave him a dose of his own medicine.

The two waited by the fallen red-skin until Wild reached them.

"I reckon it's all right now, Wild," said Charlie. "I got that galeet just in time."

"All right. Now you come with me to the edge of the trees. Jim, you go back and have a dozen of the cavalymen ready to ride out and drive back the redskins when I come with the girl. They haven't got more than two or three fires going down there in that hole they have dug, and I guess I'll be able to move about among them without being discovered."

Jim started back for the fort without a word. He knew just what to do.

Wild and Charlie soon reached the edge of the trees.

They knew the way was clear in that direction, for the Indian who had been watching was dead.

They were now within a hundred feet of the camp.

A look at it showed them how the redskins had suffered from the fight.

There was nearly a hundred lying about badly wounded.

Those who had not suffered in this way were huddled together in groups.

Near a big fire sat Yellow Snake, the chief, smoking a long-stemmed pipe.

Guards were parading back and forth, and while the two crouched in the bushes, two of them passed within twenty feet of them outside the edge of the grove.

Wild looked around carefully, but could see nothing of the captive girl.

"I'll go and find her, Charlie," he whispered. "You stay right here. If I get caught you know what to do."

"All right," was the reply. "But I've just got the idea in my head that yer ain't goin' to be caught. That rig you've got on will fool ther red galoots as sure as guns!"

Wild now began crawling around to the left.

He knew the girl was there somewhere, and he wanted to locate her before making the attempt to rescue her.

Wild could hear the redskins talking in low tones in their own language.

It was plain by their actions that they were sick of fighting, and even the chief had lost his war-like spirit.

When he had moved around twenty feet he came to a spot where he could look from and see the captive girl.

She had been untied from the log Big Tomahawk had bound her to and sat upon it, with the Indians scattered all around her, so there was no chance for her to run away.

Here and there a brave could be seen stalking about in a moody way.

Wild decided to be one of them for a time.

They were no doubt pondering over the defeat they had sustained, and no doubt wondering what would be done to them when they were finally captured by the paleface soldiers.

Wild got up, and, pulling the blanket around him, began walking with a slow tread back and forth.

He gradually neared the point where Agnes Graves sat, passing some of the warriors as he did so.

But they said nothing to him, nor he to them.

He was to all appearances a brave who desired to be left to his own reflections.

As soon as Wild saw that he attracted no attention whatever he felt easy.

He was glad that the girl was not tied, for it would make it all the easier for him to get her away.

The redskins had been considerate enough to leave her a big gray blanket to sit upon, and when the boy saw it he gave a nod of satisfaction.

Yellow Snake sat so he faced the captive, but he, too, was in a meditative mood, and he scarcely noticed her.

The boy changed his course a little and walked right close to the girl.

He was bold enough to walk right up close to the chief, too.

Then he turned and went back the same way.

This time he turned his eyes upon the captive, and when close to her he whispered:

"I am disguised as an Indian; I have come to save you. I am Young Wild West."

She gave a start as the words sounded in her ears, but she had presence of mind enough to keep her face turned the other way.

"Do just as I tell you and we'll both get away without the redskins knowing it," he said, and then he walked out of her hearing.

But he came back again in a minute or two, walking so close to one of the walking braves that their shoulders touched.

"Get up and put the blanket about you, as though you were cold," he resumed. "Then make out that you are going to sit down upon the ground that is covered with leaves. I hardly think they will interfere with you. I will make out that I think you are going to escape, and I will come and place my hand on your arm. If you see any of the rest coming toward you, break away from me and run in the direction I am looking. I will give chase, and then we will get away."

"I will do just as you say, Young Wild West," came from the girl, while she looked at the ground.

Wild walked slowly around behind where the chief was sitting, stalking so nearly like an Indian brave that he attracted not the least attention.

One of the redskins said something to him, but he shook his head and passed on into the gloom.

He was taking care not to get where the light from the fires could shine on his face.

He looked over where the girl was, and the next minute he saw her get up and place the blanket over her shoulders.

The redskins near her looked at her, but none of them offered to interfere with her.

To get away she would have to first get out of the circle. She stepped upon the log she had been seated upon and undertook to clamber to the bank above.

Wild saw one of the Utes make a move to go to her, but he was too quick for him and got there first.

He seized the girl by the arm rather roughly and a slight scream came from her lips.

She failed to recognize him at first, though she had expected the identical move.

"Let go of me, you scoundrel!" she cried. "I am not going to run away. I want to sit down where it is not so damp."

"Ugh!" grunted Wild, and he let go her arm.

Then she clambered up the bank and he followed her.

"You had better sit down for a minute or two," he said in a whisper. "They will think it is all right if I am here with you."

Agnes acted on the suggestion.

At this juncture the chief got up.

He had been sitting there smoking long enough to make one more attack on the fort.

He probably knew he was in for it, anyhow, and if he could whip the whites it would be so much more to his credit.

He issued a call for the leading braves to assemble about the fire.

Wild knew something of importance was to take place, and he decided that now was the time for him to act.

"Get up and walk away while they are not looking," he whispered. "I guess we will never have a better time."

The girl was not a second in obeying.

She slipped off in the shadows and was gone.

Young Wild West walked slowly after her, but he forgot the part he was assuming, and a redskin near him came up and peered in his face.

His regular style of walking had given him away, and he knew it.

But it was too late.

The brave said something to him and laid his hand on the boy's shoulder.

For an answer Wild hit him a stinging blow in the mouth and sent him staggering.

Then he darted away like a shot.

Wild overtook the girl just as Cheyenne Charlie loomed up before them.

"It is all right, Charlie," said the dashing young dead-shot. "We have got to run for it!"

The redskins were running after them now.

Charlie took the hand of the girl and away they went in the direction of the fort.

Wild followed him, but unfortunately for him his toe caught upon a root and he fell heavily to the ground.

Before he could get upon his feet the redskin who had discovered that he was not one of them was upon him.

Then a hand-to-hand struggle ensued.

But before Wild could get away a dozen of the red demons were around him.

"They have got me, Charlie!" he cried out. "Fire a shot for help!"

CHAPTER XI.

YOUNG WILD WEST'S FIGHT WITH THE CHIEF.

The words were scarcely out of Young Wild West's mouth when he heard a shot ring out.

Then the distant clatter of horses' hoofs came to his ears and he was overpowered.

The Utes did not seem to have any notion of killing the boy who had fooled them so neatly with the disguise he wore. They wanted to take him alive.

The fact that he had been caught helped Charlie and Agnes Graves to get away, for very few of the redskins knew just why they were running that way, and when they saw those who had caught Wild stop there, they took it for granted that he was the one they had been after.

A few, however, kept on after the scout.

As Wild was dragged back into the grove he heard a revolver cracking, and then he knew that Charlie was making himself known to the Utes who were after him.

Wild was dragged back to the light of the big fire the chief was near, and then the disguise was torn from him.

As he had put the Indian toggerly on over his regular hunting suit, there was no mistaking who it was by any one who had ever seen him before.

The Indian who had brought the message under a flag of truce recognized him at once.

"Ugh!" he exclaimed, turning to Yellow Snake; "Young Wild West!"

"Ugh!" grunted the chief, his eyes dancing with pleasure; "paleface boy heap much brave. Yellow Snake glad to meet him."

"I believe you when you say that, you old scoundrel," answered our hero, coolly. "There isn't the least doubt in my mind that you are glad to see me. Have you made up your mind to surrender yet? There are enough soldiers coming here now to eat you, so you had better save your life by surrendering."

"Young Wild West heap much fool!"

"You don't mean that when you say it, Yellow Snake. You know I am not a fool. I don't pretend to know everything, but what I am telling you is true."

"Paleface boy heap much lie. He will die, and his scalp will be worn in the belt of Yellow Snake."

"Well, maybe that's true. But I guess you won't wear my scalp long in your belt. I have got two partners who will soon make short work of you. If you don't let me go inside of five minutes you will be cleaned out."

The cavalry was approaching now, and the redskins could hear the thunder of hoofs, as well as Wild.

The majority of the Utes were lying close under the bank, waiting to put up a fight, but there were some, and Wild could not help noticing them, who acted as though they were ready to mount their ponies and ride away to save themselves.

A big change had been wrought in an hour or so, for, instead of being the attacking party, the Indians were now on the defensive.

Nearly the whole body of cavalrymen under Captain Darius galloped up to within a hundred yards of the camp.

Then the voice of Cheyenne Charlie suddenly rang out.

"Listen, Injuns!" he yelled. "If yer don't let Young Wild West go inside of two minutes we'll ride down on yer an' cut yer ter pieces!"

Wild knew then that Charlie had got the girl safely to the fort.

He was delighted, even if he had been captured himself.

He knew that the redskins would not dare harm him now, for he could tell quite plainly that his words had impressed Yellow Snake.

The cavalrymen did not fire upon the Indians.

They simply surrounded them and kept themselves partly concealed behind the trees.

They had dismounted, as Wild could tell.

The Utes crouched with their guns in their hands.

Some of them were close to their ponies, and our hero knew that these were but waiting for hostilities to begin, so they could mount and make a break for liberty.

The war-like spirit had left nearly half of them, and those who wanted to fight knew it would be hopeless for them.

Their scheme to gain possession of Fort Feather had failed disastrously.

Wild watched the expression of the chief's face.

It kept changing all the time, and finally he saw that fear was getting the best of him.

He decided that it was a time to make a play to gain his liberty.

"Yellow Snake," said he, "if you let me go I will see to it that you and your braves have a chance to lay down your arms and march out as prisoners. What do you say? There is no need of fighting any longer. You are whipped and you ought to know it."

"Paleface boy heap much talk," retorted the chief, angrily, and then he stepped up and slapped Wild on the forehead with the flat of his hand.

The boy's eyes flashed dangerously, but he could do nothing.

He was tied hand and foot.

"You wouldn't do that, and live long, if I was not tied, you contemptible hound!" he exclaimed.

Yellow Snake looked at him keenly.

"Young Wild West no fight Yellow Snake," he said.

"Let me loose and I will fight you any way you want to," answered Wild.

"Paleface boy can shoot heap much straight."

"Yes, and I can cut pretty straight with a knife, too."

"You fight Yellow Snake with knives?" queried the chief.

"Yes, or any other way."

"Good! You whip Yellow Snake and you go free; you no whip and you die!"

"All right; I am satisfied to that arrangement."

The chief picked up the knife that belonged to our hero.

Then, without another word, he threw off his blanket and stepped over and cut the boy loose.

He dropped the knife at his feet, the point sticking in the ground.

Then he motioned for the braves to get back out of the way.

As the redskin leader drew his own keen-edged knife from his belt Wild picked up the one from the ground.

The dashing young Prince of the Saddle was right in his element now.

He did not fear the outcome, for he had bested every Indian he had ever met in a duel with bowies, and he was certain he could soon put this one out of business.

All eyes were turned on the two as they faced each other in the center of the camp before the blazing fire.

Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart and the cavalrymen took advantage of this and crept up closer.

They now had the redskins virtually at their mercy.

The chief was a powerful fellow, nearly six feet tall, and he looked as though he could overcome the boy in a single rush.

But Young Wild West was as strong as the average athletic man, and his quickness and coolness was what counted in a fight of any kind.

"You had better sing your death-song, Yellow Snake," he said, tantalizingly. "I am going to send you to the Happy Hunting Grounds!"

"Ugh!" exclaimed the chief, and then he made a lunge at the boy.

But his knife blade simply cleft the empty air.

Wild knew the red scoundrel meant to kill him, as he would not be held for it on account of it being a fair square fight.

He also knew that the chief deserved death many times, and he decided to finish him.

That would make the Utes surrender quicker than anything else, for with no chief to lead them they would soon disperse.

Wild met him squarely at the next stroke and the two blades came together with a ring.

The utmost silence was maintained by the lookers-on, for even the cavalrymen were thrilled by the sight.

There were some among them who feared that the daring boy would have to succumb to the powerful chief, but Cheyenne Charlie and Jim Dart did not think that way.

They knew what sort of stuff Young Wild West was made of, and they expected to see him down Yellow Snake just the very moment he felt like doing it.

Clash—clash!

The two blades came together again and the bodies of the two bent and swayed.

The chief had been the aggressor from the start, and Wild was backing around the fire and avoiding the fierce rushes.

But suddenly this all changed.

Young Wild West set at the Indian like a tornado, and he soon had him on the defensive.

"Fight, you red scoundrel!" he cried. "You slapped me in the face when I could not help myself; now go ahead and kill me, as you are so anxious to do. If you don't hurry and do it you will go down!"

"Ugh!" was all the reply the chief made.

He had found now that he was no match for the boy, but he hung on with a dogged tenacity.

He put on an extra effort and rushed forward.

This time his knife just grazed Wild's neck and gave him a scratch from which the blood came.

But that was all.

Before he could make another thrust Young Wild West dealt the blow that ended the fight.

It was a quick thrust to the heart.

Yellow Snake staggered back and began to sing his death-song.

Down he went, the words dying on his lips.

Wild folded his arms and stood stock still in his tracks. At this juncture the voice of Captain Darius exclaimed:

"Surrender, you red fiends!"

Those of the redskins who had their ponies ready immediately mounted them and rode away, bending low to escape the bullets they knew would come.

A volley was fired at them before they had got twenty feet and many of them fell.

Those who felt like continuing the fight fired wildly in the direction the shots came from, but the rest threw down their arms and cried for quarter.

Wild leaped into the bushes and got behind a log, for he was liable to be hit by the bullets of his friends.

About half of the Utes made for their horses and many of them succeeded in making their escape in the darkness.

One of these was a young chief called Red Moccasin.

He was really the most ambitious fighter of the lot, since the old chief went under at the hands of our hero.

He was known to the cavalymen, too, and when they had gathered in the prisoners and placed them under guard the captain was not long in finding out who the leader of the escaping party was.

About eighty of them had got away, as near as they could judge.

"We will get them to-morrow," said Young Wild West. "The chances are that they will make straight for the reservation, thinking their chances will be better by surrendering when they get there. They don't want to surrender to us."

"Then you think it not necessary to pursue them tonight?" said the captain.

"No, everybody is tired out, and so are the horses. We will catch them to-morrow. Let us go back to the fort."

After the bodies of the dead Utes had been buried in the trench they had themselves dug to shield themselves from the three pieces at the fort, they all went over, taking the prisoners with them.

Agnes Graves led the women in a cheer when the victors rode inside the stockade.

Lieutenant Ainsworth, who had been left in charge, was at her side.

The lieutenant had been captivated by the charms of the young lady and the way she had acted during the whole siege had made him a strong admirer of her.

As Wild rode up and dismounted from one of the Indian ponies he had captured Lieutenant Ainsworth said:

"Well, I must thank you, Young Wild West, for managing to get Miss Graves away from the Utes. It is too bad that you were captured yourself, though."

"Well, as it has turned out all right, I think it was a good thing that I was captured. I fought the old chief a fair and square fight a little while ago, and I downed him."

As Wild said this he looked at the couple and smiled.

He saw that something stronger than an ordinary friendship had sprung up between them.

Young Wild West slept as sound as a top that night.

The next morning he was up and ready to give chase to the Indians that had escaped.

CHAPTER XII.

CONCLUSION.

It was not more than half an hour after sunrise when half the cavalymen left the fort under the lead of Young Wild West to hunt down the rest of the Indians.

Of course Charlie and Jim went along. They could hardly have been induced to stay behind.

Lieutenant Ainsworth was in command of the cavalry, and he was riding at the side of Wild.

"I received quite a little information from the Ute prisoners last night after you turned in," the lieutenant said to Wild. "This young chief, who led those who escaped, was really a rival with old Yellow Snake for leadership."

"Is that so? He must be a pretty foxy sort of a redskin then."

"Well, I don't know about that part of it. He was one of those who did not believe in surrendering to us. He thought it better to die trying to get away than to be hanged, so one of the braves told me. He thought we would hang all the prisoners we took, I suppose."

"Probably he had that idea."

"The same brave who was telling me this said that Red Moccasin was no good, or he wouldn't have been whipped by you. He says he will soon settle you when he meets you on even terms."

"Ah!" exclaimed Wild; "so that is the way it is, eh? The young chief wants to meet me, eh? Probably he wants to have revenge for the slaying of Yellow Snake."

"I guess he don't want any revenge for that, for he now has a chance of taking Yellow Snake's place if he lives."

"Well, I am very glad to hear this. I will be on the lookout for Red Moccasin, as you call him. I guess it won't be hard to single him out when we come in sight of the redskins, for he will have his hair stuck full of eagle feathers, now that the old chief is dead."

"That is about the size of it."

"Well, when I find out that there is a person who is looking for a chance to fight me, I always want to give him the chance. Red Moccasin shall have a fair show at me. I never saw the redskin I was afraid to meet yet. I am only a boy, but I grew up fighting redskins, and I know their ways pretty well. Any man could whip an Indian in a fist fight, because they know nothing of that game. But with a knife he is a dangerous customer. As far as shooting with a revolver is concerned, few redskins are very accurate. They do damage at short range, of course, but when it comes to fifty yards or so, they are not much with a shooter, and it is more by chance than anything else if they hit what they shoot at. With a bow and arrow they are all right, for they are taught archery as soon as they are big enough to bend a bow. It is the old savage instinct that is in them, and they can all send an arrow pretty true to the mark."

They were following the trail of the Indians now, and it struck Young Wild West that it was most likely they would stop at the first convenient place—or had stopped, rather, overnight.

This was found to be right, for in less than an hour they came to the place where the escaping Utes had remained over the night.

A fire was still smoldering, which told that they had not been gone very long, and that made our hero think that they would soon overtake them.

"We will have them by noon," he said. "How many men have you, lieutenant?"

"Not quite a hundred," was the reply.

"And there is supposed to be about that many Utes, you say?"

"According to what I learned from the prisoners."

"Well, we will be evened up all around, then. I am glad of that. I am going to give the young chief a chance to fight it out with me. If I whip him they are to throw down their arms and surrender, and if he gets the best of me they are to go on to the reservation undisturbed."

"Won't that be a rather dangerous thing to do, Young Wild West?" Ainsworth asked. "Suppose he should disarm you? He would have the best of you, and then we would have to let them go."

"Well, Red Moccasin won't disarm me, lieutenant. Don't let that worry you."

They rode on at a stiff pace the biggest part of the forenoon.

It was just about half an hour before noon when they sighted a moving body of horsemen approaching a strip of timber about two miles off to the left.

They instantly decided that they were the escaping Utes.

"They have turned sharply to the left to make the timber, which shows that they must have seen us," said Wild.

"Now we can cut off a good half-mile by riding straight for the point they are making for. Come on, boys! We will soon settle this thing!"

The cavalymen spurred up their tired horses and they swooped toward the timber.

The Utes reached it first, and as soon as they got there they dismounted and lined up behind the trees.

"Looks as though they means ter fight," remarked the scout.

"Yes," retorted Jim.

But when they were less than a quarter of a mile from them a brave came riding from the woods, waving a flag of truce over his head.

Young Wild West led the cavalry right on.

The redskin halted about two hundred yards from the edge of the timber and waited.

Not until they had completely surrounded him did the cavalymen come to a halt.

"You talk to him," said the lieutenant, nodding to Wild.

"All right," was the reply, and then he rode up to the Indian horseman and said:

"What do you want?"

"Red Moccasin wants to fight Young Wild West on horseback, with his hunting knife."

"Good! Tell him to get ready to die when he starts in."

"Red Moccasin wants Young Wild West to give his promise that the Utes can go on back to the reservation if Young Wild West is killed."

"Good! That is the very thing I was going to propose."

"And if Young Wild West kills Red Moccasin the Utes will all ride back to the fort as prisoners of the paleface soldiers."

"That's right. Ride back and tell him that I give my word on that proposition."

As the brave turned and rode back Wild turned to the lieutenant and his partners and observed:

"Rather strange that the chief should make the proposition I thought of, isn't it?"

"It is strange," answered Ainsworth.

"Well, come on up and form your men in a double line. I will soon take care of Red Moccasin. I am going to fight just as though my life depended on it."

There was no delay in getting the duel started.

Red Moccasin rode out on a piebald pony that was decorated with brightly colored ribbons.

The redskin must have been sincere, for he only carried a knife with him.

He was stripped to the waist and his painted and greased body shone in the sun.

Wild tossed his hat to Jim and then rode forth to meet him.

Without a word, the young chief rode out and met Wild.

The two horses met, their necks crossed and then the two knives came together.

Sparks of fire sputtered from them and the ring of steel sounded.

Young Wild West realized that Red Moccasin was superior to the old chief in that line of business, so he determined to take no chances with him.

In less than ten seconds after they met he saw an opportunity to disarm him, and he made a thrust that did it nicely.

The knife went flying from Red Moccasin's hand and a yell of applause went up from the cavalymen.

The young chief promptly dismounted and stood with folded arms.

"Young Wild West heap much fight," said the chief, slowly, as he kept his eyes on the ground. "The Utes surrender."

Lieutenant Ainsworth at once gave the command to take the redskins' weapons from them.

They came forward one at a time and gave them up.

Wild dismounted, and picking up the chief's knife handed it to him.

"Red Moccasin can keep this," he said.

Then it was that the treacherous nature of the Indian came to the surface.

He took the knife and made a move to put it in his belt, but instead of doing so he made a sudden thrust at the boy,

Wild jumped back just in time to escape the blow.

Crack!

Cheyenne Charlie fired and Red Moccasin dropped.

"That's what their measly coyote wanted," said the scout.

The braves remained perfectly submissive, however.

They knew it would go hard with them if they revolted now, since they had surrendered.

Ten minutes later they were all riding toward the fort under guard.

The fort was reached before sunset.

The next day General Fortier reached the fort with his regiment.

Young Wild West and his partners remained at Fort Feather for a few days, and then as their services were no longer required they set out for the place they had left the wife of the scout and the sweethearts of the two boys.

But before they went they learned from Lieutenant Ainsworth that pretty Agnes Graves had consented to be his wife, and that he was going over to Richfield in the fall to marry her.

"I want you and your partners to be at the wedding," he said. "I will give you due notice when it will take place."

"All right, lieutenant; I wish you luck, anyhow, whether we get to the wedding or not," answered Wild.

Then they rode away to the south and were soon lost in the distance.

Next week's issue will contain "YOUNG WILD WEST AND THE 'CROOKED COWBOYS'; OR, ARIETTA AND THE CATTLE STAMPEDE."

ELECTRIC WELDING AND CARGO CAPACITY.

The Electric Welding Committee of the United States Shipping Board, speaking of the economic saving due to electric welding, refers to the fact that in a 5,000-ton ship about 450,000 rivets are used, and about 650,000 in a ship of 9,500 tons dead-weight. The saving on the hull-plating and other vital parts in labor, cost, and time of construction, due to the substitution of welding for riveting, is conservatively placed at 25 per cent. The saving of labor on the minor parts of the ship is estimated to be from 60 to 70 per cent. There is also a considerable saving in weight, which is estimated to be about 500 tons on the hull of a 9,500-ton ship. This, of course, would mean that the ship could carry 500 tons more cargo.

SOME FACTS ABOUT WAR INSURANCE.

Any man or woman of any age in the active military or naval service of the United States can obtain Government insurance. It has been ruled that members of Officers' Training Camps are under the act and can obtain insurance. The cost for each thousand dollars of insurance is from sixty-five cents a month to persons at the age of twenty-one to one dollar and twenty cents a month to those of the age of fifty-one.

The beneficiaries are limited to wife, husband, child, grandchild, brother or sister, stepbrother or stepsister, adopted brother or adopted sister of the insured, as well as parent, grandparent, or step-parent either of the insured or of his or her consort.

The insurance is not compulsory, but the cost is low and the protection great, and not only are all persons eligible afforded every opportunity to obtain this insurance without trouble or extra expense but they are specially urged to do so.

Gen. Pershing and thousands of other officers and tens of thousands of soldiers have already taken out insurance. Up to date policies of insurance have been issued aggregating $1,032,938,000.

GIRL WAR WORKERS AS STUDENTS.

Four hundred girl war workers in Washington are now members of the evening classes at the Y. M. C. A. In this number are many who are preparing for college, although the majority is enrolled for business courses.

Recently special training has been provided for statisticians, who will be much needed after the war, and among the students is a fair representation of women. The School of Accountancy is perhaps the most popular outside of the classes in stenography. Under Thomas W. Walton, Director of Education, this branch has been developed so that it includes applied economics, corporation accounting and finance, cost accounting, advanced theory of accounting, elements of auditing, advanced auditing and scientific and industrial management. The full course is for three years of two semesters each, the semester covering seventeen weeks, two evenings each week.

And through the Y. M. C. A. girls employed by the Government have not only the advantage of vocational training, but the best possible opportunity to continue their studies. Offices close at not later than 4.30, and the classes each day are arranged between the hours of 5 and 10. To supplement the Preparatory School, the School of Accountancy, the Commercial School and the Grade School, a School of Special Courses is provided. These include drafting, Spanish, French and Latin.

SUGAR ALLOTMENT.

By increasing the monthly allotment of sugar from two to three pounds of sugar per capita on November 1, the Food Administration emphatically declares that this must not be taken as meaning that the conservation of foodstuffs generally is not now fully as important as it was at the height of the sugar shortage. While the sugar situation has improved largely, due to the splendid aid of the American housewife in reducing consumption, and also by the availability of new domestic cane and beet sugar, the need for greater exports in other lines is no less marked. The United States must increase the food exports by one-half from a harvest no larger than last year's.

The prominent part which the American woman has played in conserving sugar is best understood by a comparison of our consumption of sugar during the past four months with the consumption for a similar period in normal times. Normal consumption of sugar for the months of July, August, September and October was approximately 400,000 tons per month, or 1,600,000 tons for the four months. Following the appeal for sugar conservation there was saved approximately 300,000 tons during that period of this year. Seventy per cent. of the sugar consumed in the United States is used in the home.

In connection with the three-pound sugar rule for ninety meals, general order No. 9 for public eating places, state hotel chairmen have been advised that part of general order No. 8, covering quantity served, is changed to read "In no event shall the amount served to any one person at any one meal exceed one-half ounce." Hotel chairmen have also been advised that sugar service now authorized under general order No. 8 is one teaspoonful or its equivalent for tea or coffee plus one teaspoonful for fruit or cereal, but not for both fruit and cereal. One small lump for demi-tasse.

STANDING BY HIS CHUM

—OR—

THE SCHOOLBOYS OF RICHLAND HALL

(A SERIAL STORY)

Suddenly something shot up from the singular object.

It was round and dark, and about as big as a nail-keg.

Then all in the same instant a searchlight came out of it, and was thrown on the boys.

"Gee whiz! We want to get out of this!" gasped Jack.

All were so interested that not a boy moved.

Then all in an instant the light was thrown above them, and upon the extension.

Three times it flashed, and each time a sharp whistle sounded.

Toot! Toot! Toot!

"Signaling!" cried Dick. "Run, fellers! We're in the soup!"

They ran back towards the house, and as they did so the searchlight seemed to follow them.

"Strike for the woods!" breathed Jack.

At the same moment the door of the extension opened, and there stood Mike Cole.

He had an open canvas bag at his side, suspended from his neck by a strap.

For an instant he stood looking at the boys, now fully revealed in the line of the light.

So sudden was his appearance that the boys stood for a few seconds and stared back.

Then Mike put his hand into the bag, and as quick as a flash drew out a round object, and flung it towards them.

It landed between Dick and Bill.

Instantly there was a sharp explosion.

A bright red light shot up and with it came a great puff of foul-smelling smoke.

"Gee whiz! Bombs!" blurted Bill.

And they ran for their lives.

Bill missed his footing and fell flat.

"Oh, oh! I've sprained my ankle!" he cried.

Dick turned and pulled him to his feet, while the others ran on.

"You are my chum in this business, Bill!" he said. "I'll stand by you, old man!"

At the same instant another smoke-bomb exploded close by them.

On they ran, Bill leaning on Dick.

Another and another bomb was thrown by Mike, who followed.

Suddenly he stooped and picked up something.

It proved to be a hose nozzle, and the hose itself was attached.

"Ah, you young rascals! I'll give youse fire and wather!" he bawled, as he turned a stream on the retreating boys.

Dick and Bill got it full force, but the others were out of reach.

Mike ran on with the hose trailing after him.

Again and again Bill and Dick got it in the neck.

He trailed them half-way to the wall, and when they finally reached it and joined their companions no ladder was to be seen.

"Gee! Somebody has swiped the ladder!" gasped Bill.

"Nonsense! We are too far ddwn!" cried Dick.

A revolver shot was fired.

The boys were falling all over themselves now.

"Great Scott! This spells our finish!" Harry roared.

"Run! Run for your lives!" yelled Jack.

At last the searchlight, which hitherto had followed them like some illuminated snake, was shut off.

Bang! Bang! Bang!

Mike Cole kept on peppering away, but it was not probable that he intended to do anything more than to scare off the intruders. Certainly no shot told.

Finally they found the ladder.

Jack declared that it was in a different place, but Dick never doubted that it was just where he left it.

The valiant Harry chased in ahead, and actually pushed Dick and Bill away, so as to get over the wall first.

But they all got over safely in the end.

Dick, waiting to help Bill over, was the last, and as he was pulling the adder up after him he heard shouted in the distance:

"Cock-a-doodle-doo! Cock-a-doodle-doo! I am the King of the Night!"

CHAPTER X.

WHAT HAPPENED TO HIM.

Such was the mystery of Sam Sloan which was puzzling the boys of Dr. Richland's school.

It was destined to puzzle them more before they were through with it all.

In the meantime we must shift the scenes and seek to learn for ourselves what really did happen to Sam Sloan.

The boys had real cause to dread the Russians, but all this will develop later.

We return for the moment to the night on which Sam disappeared.

It was a long time before Sam fell asleep, but sleep he did finally, and it seemed but a moment before he suddenly woke up again, feeling a heavy pressure on his face.

There were two men in the room dressed in the yellow uniform at that date worn by Russian seamen.

One bent over Sam, holding his hand tight over the boy's mouth.

The other was leaning over Dick Dutton in the act of administering ether with a towel.

"Back here, quick!" Sam heard his own captor exclaiming. "The boy is coming to his senses. You didn't give him enough. He'll arouse the house."

Sam tried to throw up his arms and to strike away that crushing hand.

But he had been partly chloroformed or etherized, whichever it was.

His return to consciousness was but momentary.

Before the sailor who was attending to Dick's case could get to him, Sam was partly unconscious again.

There are some people who are not easily chloroformed.

Doubtless Sam Sloan was one of this sort.

Certain it is that if he had sunk into full unconsciousness he would have been carried off to Russia on the Catherine II. Sam never doubted that.

But although powerless to help himself through all that followed, Sam in a way retained his senses.

He knew that they carried him down the ladder, although it seemed to him that he was floating through the air.

He knew afterward that two men had his head and heels, and that they were carrying him somewhere.

What is more, he knew that they must be Russians, for he remembered the talk he had heard in the room.

Next he knew the men had laid him down.

Two voices were discussing his case in Russian.

Sam's eyes seemed to be glued shut then, but afterwards he got them open and saw that two of the officers of the man-of-war were with him, big, heavily bearded fellows.

"This is the boy," one now said. "See the star on his forehead."

"You are right," replied another. "It is the star of the Yriatska, yes."

"Ah, it is a relief. There were two in that room. I was sure that these fools would bring us the wrong one."

"It is right. We must get him aboard, and the President of the United States himself shall not get him away from us. The reward is ours, Michael."

"Yes, if we ever get it," was the growling response. "I had sooner had nothing to do with the business. Chances are we shall both be sent to Siberia for our pains. That will be our reward."

"Hush, you fool," was the reply. "He who croaks and prophesies evil brings evil upon himself."

All this Sam heard, and to the terror which it caused him can be attributed the mighty effort which the boy made to throw off the influence of the drug.

And Sam had the best of reasons for being afraid.

From his earliest childhood, while his mother, whom he lost but a few years before, still lived, he had been warned against this very thing.

"Beware of the Russians, my son!" were the last words his mother had spoken on her deathbed. "They murdered your father and they will murder you."

Hence Sam's agitation when he discovered that the Catherine II. was a Russian man-of-war.

And now the boy had fallen into the dreaded power of his hereditary enemy!

No wonder he felt afraid.

"I must brace up and do something or I'm done for sure," thought Sam.

He concluded that his best hold was to lie quiet and pretend unconsciousness.

The men appeared to be waiting for something.

It proved to be a boat, and Sam, as he came to look back on all this later, never could understand why they did not have it on hand.

Soon it came, and there was a lot of Russian talk.

Sam understood every word. From his earliest recollection he had been able to speak Russian. His mother, whose memory he adored, never learned to speak anything else.

They lifted him in the boat and the start for the man-of-war was made.

There was no discussing Sam now.

The Russian officers began talking of their own affairs in another language.

But Sam understood this talk, too.

It was the dialect of the Krim Tartars, a South Russian people whose very name is now, and was then, all but unknown in the United States.

These officers little dreamed that the boy who lay apparently unconscious at their feet was listening and taking in every word.

At last as the sailors rowed on they began to talk of Sam.

"Good job we didn't have to shoot him," one said.

"Of course," replied the other. "If we had we would never have got a cent."

APPEARANCES DO DECEIVE.

Muscles don't always bulge. A young woman in a freight office at Butte, Mont., resembles a sixteen-year-old boy in her working clothes. In her "off-hour" dress she is very much a woman, a woman of pleasing appearance. She weighs only 130 pounds, is 5 feet four inches tall and has feet and hands smaller than those of the average woman. But when she works! To pick up a 900-pound piano with her truck and run off with it is play for this Amazon, says the delighted foreman.

ASKS JUDGE NOT TO KISS BRIDE-TO-BE.

Robert Adair Campbell stood before a judge in Chicago, with his bride-to-be, Miss May Blanche Barnett.

"We want to be married," he said, "but we do not want the judicial kiss which is customary at such times."

The judge smiled and tied the knot, contenting himself with the usual fee, which Campbell paid and fled.

SWALLOWED PIN IN BREAD.

Fox Baking Company, York, Pa., is the defendant in a suit for damages brought by Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Kohr in the Common Pleas Court the other day. Mrs. Kohr alleges that she swallowed a pin while eating bread baked by the defendant company. She later underwent an operation for appendicitis, and the pin was found in the appendix. She claims damages for personal injuries.

LOSS OF LEG BRINGS RELIEF.

R. A. Robins of Salem, Ark., who has for many years been crippled by rheumatism and who moved about in an invalid's chair, was sitting quietly in his chair one Sunday morning recently when he moved his diseased leg very slightly and it broke in two. Surgeons were summoned and the leg was amputated, bringing relief from a condition which had caused trouble to the victim since childhood.

HORNETS AT DANCE.

The quickest one-step ever released was given recently at the home of Miss Mildred Quillin, near Greenwood, Del., when a hornets' nest, gilded and hung in the parlor, suddenly became alive when the room became heated and mingled with the guests who were dancing on the floor.

Miss Quillin was giving an evening party, and as a part of the decoration had hung up a gilded hornets' nest found in the woods by a cousin. It was during the evening while the guests were dancing that the supposedly dead nest became alive, and the room was suddenly filled with awakened hornets.

Some went out through the doors and some through the windows. Anyway, all got out safely and the hornets were driven outside, where they quickly succumbed to the cold weather.

MONSTER LEVIATHAN CARRIED 94,195 MEN ACROSS TO FRANCE.

The giant steamer Leviathan, formerly the Hamburg-American liner Vaterland, transported 94,195 American fighting men to France since she first sailed from New York as an American transport on Dec. 15, 1917, until Nov. 5, when she was laid up in Liverpool for her overhauling.

During her service of 23 days, she landed an average of 399 American soldiers on French soil daily, counting her days in port on both sides of the Atlantic and at sea. The average aggregated a little more than a German division of 12,000 men every month. She made nine and a half round trips and transported 9,419 men with their equipment and some cargo on every outward voyage. She had been worked harder than any vessel of her size—54,000 tons—was ever worked before. After her seizure by the United States, naval engineers repaired her machinery damaged by the German crew and made a decided improvement over the original.

The fastest round trip made by the Leviathan was seventeen days.

PENCIL MAKING IN MADRAS.

The government of Madras has decided that the experiments which have been made by the department of industries for the last three years in the manufacture of pencils have reached a stage at which the industry should be made over to private enterprise. Arrangements for the sale of pencils produced by the factory were completed in August, 1917, and the profit and loss statement prepared by the auditors for the period from September 1, 1917, to March 3, 1918, shows that in these seven months the factory made a profit of $1,904, which represents a return of a little over 20 per cent. on an assumed capital of $16,220. During the same period the factory produced 7,599 gross of pencils and sold 8,269 gross. The factory has deliberately been run on as small a scale as was consistent with the purpose in view, namely, the demonstration on commercial lines of the prospect of the industry. The factory produces black lead pencils lacquered in various colors, copying pencils, carpenters' pencils and diary pencils. Experiments with red and blue pencils are under way.

FROM ALL POINTS

PATRIOTIC INDIAN NOW.

"Poor Lo" the Indian, is no more poor. Instead he is patriotic. The five civilized tribes subscribed for $2,600,000 in the Fourth Liberty bonds, Gabe Parker, Superintendent of the tribes, announced. The five tribes—Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, Cherokees and Creeks—have now invested some $9,523,670 in Liberty bonds and War Savings stamps.

HOG WITH FIVE FEET.

Bennie Dearmore, son of Lee Dearmore a farmer, who lives west of Mountain Home, Ark., says that he has a hog which he has no trouble keeping track of.

It makes a track different from any hog in Baxter County. It is a five-footed hog, and makes five tracks. The extra foot extends out just below the knee of its right foreleg, and touches the ground the same as the regular foot on that leg. In other ways the animal is normal and large enough to kill. None of the other pigs in the litter in which it was born was deformed.

QUICKSILVER DEPOSITS IN ARIZONA.

The present exceptional demand for quicksilver in the manufacture of fulminate gives the domestic deposits of this metal particular interest. Deposits recently discovered in the southern part of the Phoenix Mountains, ten miles northeast of Phoenix, Ariz., are described in a short paper prepared by F. C. Schrader, just published by the United States Geological Survey. The deposits are easy of access, and, being near the rich agricultural region of Salt River Valley, are otherwise favorably situated for mining. They are being exploited on six or more properties or groups of claims, which lie in a belt, about three miles wide.

BRITISH DEVELOPMENT OF MESOPOTAMIA.

In spite of war conditions this year's harvest in Mesopotamia is expected to be the greatest in many years. The British are reported to have dug out more than 100 canals formerly used for irrigation purposes in connection with the River Euphrates but disused for many years. Some 320,000 acres have been brought afresh under cultivation.

Since the British occupation Bagdad is full of life; construction work is being carried on early and late and thousands of workmen are repaving the streets and installing electric light and sanitation. A fire brigade and a police force have been organized. The supply of pure water is assured, the water pipes being constantly extended. Many other improvements have been inaugurated.

And so ancient ruins blossom forth most modernly.

AIDS WOMEN TO DISCOVER THEMSELVES.

The United States Employment Service not only helps a woman to find a job, but in many cases the service helps a woman to find herself. The average woman who has never earned a dollar in her life is very often under the impression she is not qualified for any vocation, yet she may have had real training. Here is a case in point. A woman of refinement called at a United States employment office in New York City, said she had no qualifications, had never earned money, and asked for suggestions on what kind of training to take. The examiner in charge questioned the woman very carefully and discovered she had done considerable research work in the last four years on some important law cases for her husband and had also done a great deal of statistical work for him. The examiner found the applicant a place at $100 a month doing statistical work. In a short time the woman was promoted to a $1,800 a year job.

NAVY WILL RETURN COLLEGE STUDENTS.

Secretary Daniels announced on Nov. 14 that men who left college to enter the naval service and who now desire to resume their college courses, will be permitted to resign from the service. Such men, Mr. Daniels said, should make application to their commanding officers. In response to specific questions as to the future of the yachts and small craft comprising a part of the coast patrol fleet, Mr. Daniels said: "No orders have yet been issued to the naval district commanders. It is quite possible they are permitting the boys to come in from time to time. The whole question of the disposition of small craft taken into the service for the period of the war is now under consideration. About 100 yachts and other craft are in the service at one dollar a year. These will be turned back as quickly as possible in first class condition. Until the situation clears there will be no letting down in the Navy."

A QUEER SAPPHIRE.

There is exhibited in the National Museum at Washington a sapphire weighing nine karats, which contains a bubble that appears and disappears with changes of temperature. It is believed that a cavity in the gem incloses a quantity of carbonic acid gas under great pressure. When the temperature is such as to correspond with the "critical point" for that gas, under the particular pressure to which it is subjected in its brilliant prison house, it liquefies and becomes visible as a bubble.

ITEMS OF GENERAL INTEREST

GIRL'S PICTURE SAVES LIFE.

A metal picture case carrying his sweetheart's likeness is credited with saving the life of Lieut. Edward Kester, according to a letter received by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Kester, of Everett, Wash. The letter was written from the hospital, where the young man is recovering from his wound. Kester went over with the 91st Division Infantry, and evidently he went over the top with them, for he says, a machine gun bullet made the wound. He was carried to a dressing station by four German prisoners.

GUM STOPS GAS LEAK.

When it comes to resourcefulness leave it to Mrs. Ernest Byfield and Miss Elaine V. Rosenthal, embryo motor mechanics who are fitting themselves for service in the Motor Supply Corps, Chicago, Ill.

A little thing like a gas tank leak is nothing to them, even if it does happen way out on a country road. So when they were motoring along and had to stop because of it. Mrs. Byfield suggested that chewing gum would stop the leak, since they had nothing better. It did, but they had to chew 110 sticks, which they purchased at a nearby store, to get the desired effect. Yes, they could still talk and tell about it when they got back despite the stiffness of their jaws.

NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

British newspapers comment on the fact that considerable anxiety is being displayed by the German capitalist classes in efforts to evade the war charges facing their country. The wealthier Germans are said to be transferring large amounts of money to neutral countries.

"The Times" and other London papers declare that the Allied governments will not allow chicanery of this sort to interfere with any rightful demands which they may make upon German resources. This is declared to be realized by financiers in neutral countries, who look upon the manoeuvres of the German capitalists with suspicion.

WISE OLD DOG.

The cat that came back has nothing on Knight, the bulldog owned by the children of Mr. and Mrs. John Gray of Mystic, Conn., for the cat, when she came back, had to hike in the old-fashioned way, while Knight utilizes modern methods.

The family formerly resided in Noank, seven or eight miles from their present home, and there Knight was brought when a puppy. Since the family has moved to Mystic, the dog at times evinces homesickness for the old place and a number of times has taken French leave and gone back to see it.

He will "visit" with the new tenants of the place until taken back and put aboard the car and sent home. Several times he has been watched, but he never displays any interest in his surroundings or the trolley stations until he hears Noank called.

For several days Mrs. Anna Wells of Little Creek, N. H., observed that the cistern pump in her kitchen worked hard and only threw a small stream of water. Finally she could get no water at all.

When Mr. Wells came to dinner she told him of her trouble. He took the pump apart and found the valve clogged with pennies, dimes and nickels. They were removed, the pump adjusted and it works as good as ever.

The Wells have a parrot which is given the freedom of the house. During the afternoon Mrs. Wells saw the parrot perched upon the pump handle. She watched it and saw the bird drop a penny into the pump.

Mrs. Wells says that for a year she has kept pennies, dimes and other change in an open dish and that the parrot was stealing them and dropping them into the pump. She now keeps her loose change under cover where Polly can't find it.

DWARFING TEXAS.

It is the northeastern part of Japan that is celebrated for its success in dwarfing trees. There for centuries it had been deemed the highest taste on the part of householders to display about their dwellings such trees, forming miniature patches of exquisite landscape. For some years the American taste for Japanese dwarfed trees has been increasing, and those imported from the island empire bring good prices. At one sale six hundred trees brought nearly $10,000. A maple about forty inches in height was sold for $117. Pines in Japan are considered to be the most important of dwarf trees and great care is taken in their cultivation and preservation. They are generally grown from seed. It is said to take about ten years for the effectual dwarfing of a pine. From the second year, when the trees are about eight inches in height, the training into the desired shapes is carried on. The plants are tied with rice straw to bamboo canes and are bent into different forms. Not until the seventh year is this process varied. Then the trees are potted, the pots being about a foot and a half in diameter. Great care must be taken for the next three years to keep young shoots pinched back. American gardeners, studying the Japanese method, have, it is said, evolved a system somewhat of their own, and one experimenter has asserted that he could grow a whole forest in a bedroom without crowding the furniture. While the Japanese confine their efforts largely to evergreens, Americans have dwarfed deciduous trees.

WASHWOMAN LEARNING STENOGRAPHY.

Working side by side with young men and young women, young enough to be her grandchildren, Mrs. Ethel Hicks, for years a washerwoman in Lamont, Ia., is taking a course of stenography in a local business college. She intends following it instead of her former profitable business.

LIVED AS A HERMIT TO ESCAPE SERVICE.

Since June, 1917, Alfred H. Behrmann, aged thirty-one years, told the police who arrested him he had been living as a hermit in the mountains of California, with a tent as his home, where he fled to evade the Draft Law. Now that the war was over, he said, his conscience would not permit him to go free, wherefore he surrendered himself to the authorities.

BIG BLACKFISH.

William Walsh of the Division of the Naval Reserve stationed at Nantucket, astride of a stranded blackfish, gives an idea of the size and appearance of the fish which have this year visited Nantucket for the first time in forty-four years. Two schools of the fish have so far been stranded on the north shore of the island this summer, the first in early July and the second recently.

The second school was the larger, being made up of about seventy-five fish, while the first counted up fifty-six. The heaviest of the first weighed over 3,000 pounds. The fish was not dead, but merely stranded. Walsh got it into deep water and took a ride upon it some quarter of a mile or more out to sea.

FACTS ABOUT WATCHES.

"I frequently get interesting watches to repair," remarked a jeweler. "Here is one, for instance, with diamond jewels and, would you believe it, notwithstanding the hardness of the diamond, diamond jewels do not wear as well as the jewels found in the ordinary watch, the sapphire or ruby jewels. Many people place an exaggerated value on their watches because the latter have diamond jewels. A few years ago a collector of watches showed me a watch which had been picked up on the battlefield of Waterloo. The watch was a most elaborate affair, having a beautifully chased movement and diamond jewels. The jewels had actually been worn through by the steel pivot. Diamonds are all right as ornaments and in the form of bort are very serviceable for many mechanical purposes, but for watch jewels the diamond is more ornamental than useful."

STRANGE STORY TOLD IN LETTER.

According to a letter received by his parents at Barlow from Joe Johnston, on the U. S. S. Tow-happen, the naval collier Cyclops, which mysteriously disappeared early last spring while en route from South America to the United States with manganese and passengers, has been found in the Kiel Canal, where the collier was taken by the Germans who captured her.

Johnston wrote under the date of Nov. 26 from Newport News to his mother as follows:

"I suppose you know by this time they have found the Cyclops in the Kiel Canal, where the Germans had her. I was talking to a fellow from the U. S. S. Orion and she is leaving soon to go over and put the Cyclops back into commission. They are taking on coal, oil, wireless equipment and a large amount of supplies, and if the engines are disabled beyond temporary repairs will tow her back to the United States."

ENORMOUS BASKING SHARK WEIGHS TONS.

The taking in Monterey Bay, California, by the Santa Cruz fishermen of a huge basking shark weighing almost two tons, a fish 18½ feet long, calls attention to how big these species grow. According to Dr. David Starr Jordan, the basking shark reaches a length of 36 feet.

Dr. Jordan writes: "It is a dull and sluggish animal of the northern seas, almost as inert as a sawlog, often floating slowly southward in pairs in the spring and caught occasionally by whalers for its liver.

"When caught its huge flabby head spreads out wide on the ground, its weight in connection with the great size of the mouth cavity rendering it shapeless.

"Although so clumsy and without spirit, it is said that a blow with its tail will crush an ordinary whaleboat.

"The basking shark is known on all northern coasts, but has most frequently been taken in the North Sea and about Monterey Bay in California. From this locality specimens have been sent to the chief museums of Europe.

"In its external characters the basking shark has much in common with the man eater. Its body is, however, relatively clumsy forward; its fins are lower and its gill openings are much broader, almost meeting under the throat.

"The great difference lies in the teeth, which in Cetorhinus are very small and weak, about 200 in each row. The basking shark, also called elephant shark and bone shark, does not pursue its prey, but feeds on small creatures to be taken without effort.

"Fossil teeth of Cetorhinus have been found from the Cretaceous, as also fossil gill rakers, structures which in this shark are so long as to suggest whalebone."

Mrs. C. N. Newell, eighty years old, is the champion knitter of Cleveland, O. Although she is decidedly past the age when most women do much knitting, Mrs. Newell has set a mark of 175 pairs of soldiers' socks and ten soldiers' helmets in the last twelve months.

Salina citizens now get their groceries from the "Black Maria," which formerly hauled prisoners to the police station. "Business" has fallen off so much that the vehicle, bought some time ago, has been sold. The City Jail was empty for several months before the decision was reached. Now the County Jail in this "dry" country also is void of inhabitants.

The wife of the Rev. Elijah Torrants, a negro minister of Evansville, Ind., has been arrested by the local police on a charge of bringing liquor into Indiana from Henderson, Ky., in violation of the State Prohibition law. When searched at the police station it was found that the woman had a large hot water bottle filled with whiskey, which was used by her as a bustle. Mrs. Torrants said she brought the whisky here as influenza medicine.

The old boots and shoes that are cast into the dustbin have considerable value. They are soaked in water to remove the dirt, all the nails and threads are picked out and the leather is reduced to a thick pulp, from which wall papers, screens, etc., are made. The finer the original quality of leather the better it takes the bronze and old gold of the designs which make these hangings things of beauty. Bookbinders and framemakers also know the value of this pulp, and carriage builders press it into sheets which are invaluable for the roofs of the most luxurious vehicles.

One Friday morning recently Filipinos snaring eels and other fish in the Pasig near the old captain of the port building by the aid of fish snares caught the largest eel ever seen on the waterfront. It was fully ten feet in length. Both banks of the Pasig and all the ships and lighters moored in the stream were thronged with hundreds of Filipinos with snares and spears trying to catch the fish that in myriads were swimming near the surface of the stream. Natives when asked in regard to the phenomenon were almost unanimous in their statement to the effect that at this time of the year the bottom of the river gets hot and that the fish have to leave the depths of the stream and flash back and forth on or near the surface. Another theory that seemed to have a great many adherents was to the effect that at this time every year there was a change in the character of the water, this change acting on the fish as a stimulant. This theory was advanced by an old pilot who has witnessed the phenomenon for many years.

GRINS AND CHUCKLES

Cecile—Professor, do you believe there are microbes in kisses? The Professor—I don't know; but it is a matter I should very much like to investigate.

"What is the most important thing about handling a sailboat?" The old salt looked the novice over thoughtfully and then replied, "Knowing how to swim."

Old Nurse (to newly married couple, after viewing the wedding presents)—Well, my dears, you ought to be very 'appy. There ain't a thing amongst 'em as a pawnbroker wouldn't be pleased to 'andle.

Slow train, local time. Dispute between passenger and guard. Guard—Well, sir, I've been on this train, boy and man, for thirty-five years. Bitter Passenger—Good heavens, man, what station did you get in at?

"Yeh," said Tommy, "pa gave me a watch to carry when I started in at school this fall. "Me!" exclaimed Aunt Jane, "that's nice, isn't it?" "Yes'm; 'cause as soon as I git in school in the mornin's I kin look at it an' see how many minutes I'm late."

Mrs. Sharp—Have you filed those divorce papers for me? If so, I want you to stop them at once. Lawyer—Have you made it up with your husband? Mrs. Sharp—Good gracious, no! But he's just been run over and killed by a motor car, and I want to sue the owner for damages.

Teacher—I wonder what your mother would say if she knew how backward you are in geography? Girl—Oh, my mother says she never learnt jögfry and she's married, and Aunt Sally says she never learnt jögfry and she's married; and you did and you ain't.

A LIVELY CHASE

By Alexander Armstrong.

Poor little Pete roamed around the streets, with his hands in his pockets, a sad expression in his blue eyes, a lonesome air in general, and in particular a very empty sort of a feeling in the region of his bread-basket.

Pete's father had died long ago, and his mother had followed him just one week ago, leaving her only child to battle alone with the cruel world; she had managed to get along and keep him to school, by working very hard; but when she died there was nothing left, and the little furniture they had was taken to pay expenses connected with the funeral, and Pete wandered forth houseless and homeless.

Too proud to beg while it could be avoided, he had endured the pangs of hunger more than once during that week, and had slept at night wherever he could find shelter under wagons or in them, or inconvenient dry goods boxes.

Cold, hungry and tired, Pete cast around one night for a place to sleep.

A large box was found at last, open side down toward the ground; Pete looked around; nearby was a grocer's wagon, half filled with hay.

"I'll put it back in the morning," said Pete, as he took a small armful of hay from the wagon.

Lifting the box, he thrust in the hay, then crawled in himself and let the box down.

His next move was to spread the hay out, and then he curled upon it with a sigh of satisfaction; it was the most comfortable bed he had known since his mother's death, and he could not help muttering:

"I'm as snug as a bug in a rug."

The air was cool, for fall weather was coming on, but within the box it was nice and warm; still there was ventilation enough, for there was a wide crack in the side of the box that faced the street, through which Pete saw the glitter of the light on the buttons of the passing policeman, and snuggled down closer lest he should betray himself.

And then he fell asleep.

He was tired, and slept quietly and soundly until he was awakened by the sound of a heavy boot-heel striking against the box; but he wakened quietly and did not stir, and glancing at the crack saw the boot that had aroused him swaying to and fro, ere it struck again.

Its owner was sitting on the box.

And he had a companion, for Pete could hear two voices in low conversation; they had evidently just met each other.

"Did you fix it, Bill?" asked one.

"Yes."

"Ain't you afraid of being found out?"

"No; why should I? I got in through a window that is always left undone, though nobody else knows on't. The only thing I'm sorry for was that I couldn't get into the safe in the office."

"True enough; revenge is sweet, but a little money comes handy now and then."

"You're right in saying revenge is sweet. It's the sweetest thing on earth when a man feels that he's been injured."

"What did you do?" said the other. "I haven't heard the particulars."

"Well," and the voice sunk so low that Pete had to strain to catch the words, "you know the engineer—blame him—got down on me, and got me discharged from my berth as fireman."

"Yes."

"And then we had some words. I called him some names, and he knocked me down with the starting-bar."

"After you had pulled a knife on him!"

"That's got nothin' to do with it. He knocked me down with the bar, and jumped on me, and then got me locked up. I took a solemn oath to his face that I'd have his life. And when old Moneybags, as we calls the boss, stepped up and said he'd spend a thousand dollars to convict me, I gave him my curse; 'and,' says I, 'I'll cost you more nor that,' and so I will.

"I went in through the window they used to throw ashes out of, and went upstairs to the engine-room; I got a wrench—and you know the big fly-wheel? Well, pard, I loosened a segment of that, and when the big thing gets a-goin', and that 'ere piece flies out, it'll cause more'n a thousand dollars to repair the damage; it'll go clean through the building, and snap off the beams like pipe stems; that's for the benefit of Hanks & Co., sugar refiners," he said, with grim satisfaction.

"And the engineer, curse him, I've fixed it so he will be carried out with his skull caved in!"

"You know what the governors are? Well, I jest loosened 'em; they're jest held by a thread like, and the minute the engine gets going good, they flies out like cannon balls and smashes in his head. Ha! ha! The governors was a good idea; they're fixed right afore his face as he uses the starting bar; they can't miss him!" and again he laughed heartily over his devilish scheme, at the unfolding of which poor Peter's blood ran cold with horror, and his teeth chattered until one of the men started at the sound and exclaimed:

"What kin that be?"

At this poor Peter gripped his teeth tightly and cowered down closer, scarcely daring to breathe, for he knew that if discovered by those who could perform such hellish work they would not hesitate to murder a poor boy like himself, whose absence would never be noticed.

It was long after daylight, but there were no passers-by of any account, for it was a lonely, out-of-the-way place, occupied by stables and such like, which had been visited early in the morning and would not be generally visited again until the truckmen returned to put up their horses for the night; so the two worthies on top of the box sat still, nobody appearing to move them on.

Pete thought of the engineer; and his heart came up in his throat.

He knew where Hanks & Co.'s sugar refinery was; it was only eight or nine blocks distant; if they would only go, he would hurry there, and warn them of their danger.

An hour passed, during which little Pete grew calmer and cooler, and more brave from his long immunity from detection.

He moved softly until he had his eye applied to the crack, when he saw the foot of one of the men; it had a very high heel, and a sole four or five inches thick; and then he waited and listened.

"Let's be a-movin'," said one.

"No hurry," said the discharged fireman. "What time is it?"

"About a quarter of seven."

Pete heard the other slap his hands in a gratified way, and then say:

"Fifteen minutes more will do the business!"

Pete shuddered.

It was awful to hear them talk thus; to know that human beings were in danger and not be able to warn them of it.

It was horrible, and his agony of mind brought out the perspiration at every pore.

He could hear his own heart-beats, so loud and distinct were they.

Five minutes passed. Six—seven—eight—nine!

Still they sat motionless above him.

"What time is it now?" asked Bill.

"Four minutes of seven."

And the sugar house nine blocks away.

Pete groaned audibly.

"What was that?" cried Bill, in alarm.

Pete knew that he had been heard; that discovery was certain, and excited by the awful weight of the secret he had overheard, wild with apprehension, his only thought to reach the refinery in time to forestall the execution of the villainous plot, he raised himself up, overturned the box, jumped up and darted away up an alley, long, crooked and dirty, and quiet as the grave.

With a yell of fear and rage, Bill sprang after him and seized him by the coat collar ere he reached the other end of the alley.

Throwing back his arms, Pete sprang forward, and the garment was stripped from him like the skin from an eel.

It was a lively chase and a close one.

Pete strained every muscle, impelled as much by terror as anything else, and Bill pursued, brandishing a knife; he reached for the boy several times, but on each occasion a wild spring placed Pete once more in advance.

At last, with a savage curse, Bill flung the knife at the flying boy.

It circled over and over, and finally striking at the right angle, buried itself in Pete's shoulder.

A cry of pain; he staggered a mintue, then recovered and bounded onward, the whistle for seven o'clock sounding like a death-knell in his ears.

The refinery was in sight.

He reached the arched gateway and staggered through it; glanced wildly around the court in which he found himself; located the engine room, staggered weakly towards it, and flung open the door.

The engineer's hand was at the starting-bar; he moved it; a rush of steam, and the ponderous fly-wheel commenced slowly turning.

Pete tried to speak, but could not.

He glanced at the heavy, swinging balls flew out and fell with a crash several feet away.

He had averted an awful catastrophe, and the firm of Hanks & Co. proved themselves grateful for the good service he had done them.

The knife was taken from the wound, and he was cared for until he recovered, when he was given a position in their office.

Bill and his companion were caught as they were sneaking aboard of a steamboat to leave the city.

The former was punished severely for his villainy, while his companion served out a sentence on another charge.

FIRST POSTAL SERVICE.

The first regular postal service between two American cities was established 246 years ago on Dec. 10, 1672, when the Government of New York inaugurated a regular monthly post to Boston. Some thirty-three years before that a post office had been opened in Boston at the house of Richard Fairbanks, "for all letters which are brought from beyond the seas, or are to be sent thither." In 1657 the Virginia Assembly provided for the "rapid transmission" of official communications from plantation on penalty of one hogshead of tobacco for each default. Four years after the establishment of the New York—Boston monthly mail, the Colonial Court of Massachusetts founded an official post office in Boston, with John Heyward as Postmaster. The first parliamentary act for the establishment of a postal system in the English-American colonies was passed in 1692, and a royal patent was granted Thomas Neale, who was authorized to transport "letters at such rates" as the planters should agree to give. Neale began operations in Virginia, and the other colonies soon joined in the movement, although the system was very imperfect. The English postal system was extended to the colonies in 1710. The rate on a single letter from London to New York was one shilling, and four pence, or eight cents, was charged for each sixty miles from New York.

GUM WADS ON SEATS.

Gum wads—four to the seat and tons in the aggregate—are being removed from the under sides of Chicago theatre seats. The cleanup was ordered as a health measure by city authorities, who declare that all mouth-inhabiting bacteria find a happy haven in the gum collections. A count in one theatre showed 3,462 discarded cuds, inspectors said.

A FECK OF TROUBLE.

One of the hardest puzzles ever invented. Mix blocks well, then move squares without removing the box, so that every line of figures, up and down and across, and the two diagonals, will each add up 23. The Blank space may be left in either of the four corners.

Price 10 cts. each by mail, postpaid.

THE WAR FOUNTAIN PEN.

A very handsome fountain pen case to which is attached a pocket holder neatly made of metal and highly nickel-plated. When your friend desires the use of your pen and gets it, he is very much astonished when he removes the cap by the sudden and loud noise of the explosion that occurs, and yet a little paper cap does it all. Price 35c. by mail, postpaid.

ADAM'S TEASER PUZZLE.

This is a nut cracker. The way to do it is as follows: Turn the top of the two small loops toward you, taking hold of the two large loops with each hand. Hold firm the loop held with the left hand and pull the other toward the right, and at the same time impart a twisting motion away from you. You can get the rest of the directions with the puzzle. Price 12 cents each, by mail, postpaid.

H. F. LANG, 1815 Centre St., B'klyn, N. Y.

THE JOKE SPIKE.

This joke spike is an ordinary iron spike of very large size, the same as is found in any carpenter's nail box. At the small end is a small steel needle, 1/2 inch in length, firmly set in spike. Take your friend's hat or coat and hang it on the wall by driving (with a hammer) the spike through it into the wall; the needle in spike will not injure the hat or garment, neither will it show on wall or wood where it has been driven. The deception is perfect as the spike appears to have been driven half-way through the hat or coat, which can be left hanging on the wall. Price, 10 cents, or 3 for 25 cents; by mail, postpaid.

SCIENTIFIC MIND READING.

Wonderful! Startling! Scientific! You had a friend in a handsome set of cards on which are printed the names of the 28 United States Presidents. Ask him to secretly select a name and hold the card to his forehead and think of the name. Like a flash comes the answer "Lincoln, Washington," or whatever name he is thinking of. The more you repeat it the more puzzling it becomes. With our outfit you can do it anywhere, any time, with anybody. Startle your friends. Do it at the next party or at your club and be the hit of the evening. This was invented by a famous magician. Send for complete set of cards and full instructions, 12 cents, mailed, postpaid.

JAPANESE MAGIC PAPER.

The latest, greatest and best little trick perfected by the ingenious Japanese is called Yaka Hana. It consists of two packages of specially prepared paper, one a sensitized medium, and the other a developing medium. The process of manufacture is a secret. By wetting a white sheet, and pressing a pink sheet on top of it, the white sheet will develop quaint photographic scenes, such as landscapes of Japan, portraits of Japanese characters, pictures of peculiar buildings, Gods, Temples, etc. These pictures are replicas of actual photographs, and print up in a beautiful sepia brown color. Intensely interesting for both old and young. Price, 12c per package, by mail postpaid.

GAINED 25 POUNDS IN 2 MONTHS

SINCE QUITTING

TOBACCO HABIT

SUCCESSFUL CONQUEROR ATTAINED AT LAST!

HJALMAR NELSON, (address on application), whose photo appears at the left, learned of a book and other information being given FREE, explaining how Tobacco Habit can be conquered by oneself, safely, speedily and completely. He obtained the information and is now able to report a gain of 25 pounds in weight (from 163 to 188 pounds), as well as

A THREE DAYS' VICTORY OVER SLAVERY TO TOBACCO HABIT

HERE are more letters—voluntary testimonials. Though they are a small fraction of the thousands and thousands that can be produced, they are sufficient to show you what may be expected after the Tobacco Habit is overcome within 72 hours, by the simple Woods Method:

"While addicted to the tobacco habit, every muscle and joint ached, and I had almost given up business. I was poor in health, weighing about 130 pounds. Now I am well, weigh 165 pounds, and can work every day. I have never wanted to chew or smoke since following the Woods method."—A. F. Shelton, (No. 190600), Pittsylvania Co., Va. (Full address on application.)

"I have no craving for tobacco; this I consider wonderful after having used a pipe for 35 years. I have gained 12 pounds in two months, which is very good at the age of 59 years. To say that the benefits far exceed my expectations, is putting it mildly. Anyone in doubt can refer to me."—John Brudie, (No. 153235), Wapello Co., Iowa. (Full address on application.)

"I had weighed as low as 128 pounds, never got over 135 while I used tobacco. Now I weigh 156 pounds. Everyone wants to know why I got so fleshy. I tell them to follow Edward J. Woods' method for overcoming tobacco and find out."—W. S. Morgan, No. 11815 K), Cooke Co., Tex. (Full address on application.)

"I smoked for more than 20 years but now I am proud to say that for the past nine months I have no crave for smoking; I feel better and am gaining in weight every month since I stopped."—William Crawford, (No. 206737), Philadelphia Co., Penna. (Full address on application.)

WOULDN'T YOU LIKE TO QUIT TOBACCO QUICKLY AND EASILY AND ENJOY YOURSELF A THOUSAND TIMES BETTER WHILE IN ROBUST HEALTH?

STOP RUINING YOUR LIFE.

Why continue to commit slow suicide, when you can live a really contented life, if you only get your body and nerves right? It is unsafe and torturing to attempt to rid oneself of tobacco by suddenly stopping with "will power"—don't do it.

The correct way is to eliminate nicotine poison from the system, and genuinely overcome the craving.

Tobacco is poisonous and seriously injures the health in several ways, causing such disorders as nervous dyspepsia, sleeplessness, gas belching, gnawing or other uncomfortable sensation in stomach, constipation, headache, weak eyes, loss of vigor, red spots on skin, throat irritation, catarrh, asthma, bronchitis, heart failure, melancholy, lung trouble, impure (poisoned) blood, heartburn, torpid liver, loss of appetite, bad teeth, foul breath, lassitude, lack of ambition, weakening and falling out of hair and many other disorders.

Overcome that peculiar nervousness and craving for cigarettes, cigars, pipe, chewing tobacco or snuff.

Here is an opportunity to receive FREE a carefully compiled treatise on the subject, containing interesting and valuable information that you should be glad to learn about. This book tells all about the renowned Three Days' Method by which Mr. Nelson, and thousands and thousands of others, saved themselves from the life-wrecking tobacco habit. Full particulars, including the book on tobacco and snuff habit, will be mailed FREE TO YOU in plain wrapper, postpaid. All you need do is merely REQUEST IT. A postcard will do. Address

FREE! I WAS BALD

Got New Growth of Hair by Indian's Recipe

Will Send It Free

I am a business man. At the age of 66 I have a superb hair growth where once I was bald.

I was told by an eminent expert that never could any hair grow because the roots were extinct.

A Cherokee Indian "medicine man" proved to me that the roots of my hair were yet alive after having been imbedded in my scalp like bulbs or seeds in a bottle, needing only proper fertilizing. This is said often to be the case with persons who imagine they are permanently bald.

To my amazement and joy new hair grew all over the spot that had been bare.

The recipe I am willing to send free to you if you enclose a stamp for return postage. Address: John Hart Brittain, 150 East Thirty-second St., (BB-103) New York, N. Y.

FREE—5 Shooter

The Son-of-a-Gun is really a very much alive young shooter. It is harmless because it does not emit bullets but squids of water—five rapid-fire shots! Then reload easily.

A sharp squirt of water has a tingle that will make a rowdy jump and will cause a baby to cry or run away howling.

If you are going shooting for some reason, you might put a few drops of ink in the water. If you intend shooting at a lovely maid, try a little perfume—she will be surprised and then delighted. Shoot at her with milk. The fellow will be in the air, then realize the joke. Put the milk from her fat and be happy. For a troublesome dog use soapy water, and the dog will be in the eyes will make the yelping come too late in the future.

The Son-of-a-Gun has no rubber bulb to deteriorate and spoil; it will keep in good condition for rapid-fire liquid shooting, requiring no care beyond keeping clean.

The Son-of-a-Gun will be sent FREE for selling ten packets of our famous MARVEL MENDER at a dime apiece, send the $1.00. We will forward the 10 packets with this wonderful pistol; all postpaid.
